

MATTHEW ARNOLD

ESSAYS IN CRITICISM

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY

CLEMENT A. MILES

AND NOTES BY

LEONARD SMITH

OXFORD

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1918

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

LONDON EDINBURGH GLASGOW NEW YORK

TORONTO MELBOURNE CAPE TOWN BOMBAY

HUMPHREY MILFORD

PUBLISHER TO THE UNIVERSITY

PR
4022
E3
1918

CONTENTS

	PAGE
EDITOR'S INTRODUCTION . . . . .	v
PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION OF THE ESSAYS . . . . .	3
THE FUNCTION OF CRITICISM AT THE PRESENT TIME . . . . .	9
THE LITERARY INFLUENCE OF ACADEMIES . . . . .	37
MAURICE DE GUÉRIN . . . . .	64
EUGÉNIE DE GUÉRIN . . . . .	92
HEINRICH HEINE . . . . .	116
PAGAN AND MEDIAEVAL RELIGIOUS SENTIMENT . . . . .	143
JOUBERT . . . . .	163
SPINOZA AND THE BIBLE . . . . .	192
MARCUS AURELIUS . . . . .	217
EDITOR'S NOTES . . . . .	242

INTRODUCTION

SAINTE-BEUVE, the French writer who most influenced Matthew Arnold, says in one of his causeries that the first condition of properly appreciating the critics of past days is, to put oneself back into the situation, the ideas, the spirit of their time. The following introduction will attempt something of the kind for the author of Essays in Criticism.

The facts of his early life may be briefly told. Born at Laleham near Staines on December 24, 1822, he was the eldest son of the famous Dr. Thomas Arnold, who in 1828 became Head Master of Rugby. He was educated for some years at Laleham by his uncle, John Buckland, and in 1836 was sent to Winchester, his father's old school. After a year there Dr. Arnold removed him to Rugby, where he remained for four years. In 1840 he gained a classical scholarship at Balliol College, Oxford, going into residence there in 1841. He took his degree, with a 'Second Class' only, in 1844, and in 1845 was elected to a fellowship at Oriel College. For a brief period he was a master at Rugby; then he became private secretary to the Marquess of Lansdowne, President of the Council in Lord John Russell's ministry. In 1851 he was appointed to an inspectorship of schools, a post which he held for thirty-five years. An appointment in 1859 as Foreign Assistant Commissioner on Education to visit France, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, and Piedmont, brought Arnold into relation with many distinguished men, notably in Paris, where he met Prosper Mérimée, Renan, and Sainte-Beuve.

Already in 1849 he had published privately and without much success a small volume of verse, The Strayed Reveller and other Poems, followed in 1852 by Empedocles on Etna and other Poems, the most important contents of both volumes being reprinted with several new pieces in Poems by Matthew Arnold, a new edition, in 1853. In the Preface to this volume, we find him laying down for the first time, in his best and purest style, the general principles of literary criticism which he afterwards developed and applied. His excursions into politics began later with the pamphlet England and the Italian Question (1859), and into theology with his attack upon Bishop Colenso's book on the Pentateuch (1863). In the Preface of 1853 Arnold denounced certain intellectual defects of his own countrymen, and the charge was emphasized strongly in the lectures On Translating Homer (published in 1861), delivered by him at Oxford as Professor of Poetry. (He was elected to this office in 1857 and held it for ten years.)

In the second of the lectures Arnold asserts that 'at the present hour' English literature, 'regarded not as an object of mere literary interest but as a living intellectual instrument, ranks only third in European effect and importance among the literatures of Europe; it ranks after the literatures of France and Germany'.<sup>1</sup> The Essays in Criticism (1865), collected and reprinted from various periodicals in which they had appeared, are concerned with the illustration of this statement and the finding of a remedy. In the first essay (p. 12) Arnold has pointed out that two powers concur in literary creation, 'the power of the man and the power of the moment'. To consider these factors in his own case may throw some light on his point of view.

From his father, the strenuous reformer of the English public school, the distinguished historian, the earnest Liberal politician, the founder of the Broad Church movement of the nineteenth century, Matthew Arnold derived his purposeful energy, his reforming spirit, the 'Hebraising' element in his character. This 'Hebraism' was tempered in the son by a sense of humour, by wide reading of French and German literature, and by intercourse with men of letters during his visits to the Continent, where his urbanity and natural grace of disposition won him easy access everywhere.

<sup>1</sup> Essays by Matthew Arnold (Oxford University Press, 1914), p. 285.

Dr. Arnold's influence is constantly evident in his son's work: his 'greatness', Matthew Arnold wrote to his mother on November 18, 1865, 'consists in his bringing such a torrent of freshness into English religion by placing history and politics in connexion with it'.<sup>1</sup> 'I never touch on considerations about the State', he writes again (Christmas Day, 1867) 'without feeling myself on his ground.'<sup>2</sup> Yet he was by no means a blind worshipper—'Dear Dr. Arnold was not infallible', he once replied, with his gentle smile, when a dictum of his father's was quoted as authoritative.<sup>3</sup>

Every one knows the apostrophe to Oxford—'home of lost causes, and forsaken beliefs'—which closes the Preface to Essays in Criticism. Matthew Arnold was at Oxford at the very height of the Tractarian Movement, in the days of Newman's greatest influence. Upon him, Mr. Herbert Paul<sup>4</sup> rather strangely says, Newman 'seems to have had no effect whatever'. This may be true as regards dogmatic beliefs, but in point of fact Arnold, in his very interesting lecture on Emerson,<sup>5</sup> tells of the profound impression left upon him by Newman's preaching. 'Forty years ago,' he says, 'when

<sup>1</sup> Letters of Matthew Arnold, edited by G. W. E. Russell (1895), vol. i, p. 311.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid., vol. i, p. 381.

<sup>3</sup> Herbert W. Paul, Matthew Arnold (1902), p. 175.

<sup>4</sup> Op. cit., p. 11.

<sup>5</sup> Discourses in America (1885), pp. 138 f.

I was an undergraduate at Oxford, voices were in the air there which haunt my memory still.' The first of these was that of Newman, then in the very prime of life: 'he was close at hand to us at Oxford; he was preaching in St. Mary's pulpit every Sunday; he seemed about to transform and to renew what was for us the most national and natural institution in the world, the Church of England. Who could resist the charm of that spiritual apparition, gliding in the dim afternoon light through the aisles of St. Mary's, rising into the pulpit, and then, in the most entrancing of voices, breaking the silence with words and thoughts which were a religious music, subtle, sweet, mournful? I seem to hear him still. . . . Or, if we followed him back to his seclusion at Littlemore, . . . who could resist him there either, welcoming back to the severe joys of Church-fellowship, and of daily worship and prayer, the firstlings of a generation which had well-nigh forgotten them?'

But there were other voices besides Newman's sounding in the ears of the young men at Oxford. 'There was the puissant voice of Carlyle; so sorely strained, over-used, and misused since, but then fresh, comparatively sound, and reaching our hearts with true, pathetic eloquence.' And through Carlyle came 'a greater voice still—the greatest voice of the century'—the voice of Goethe, with Wilhelm Meister and its 'large, liberal view of human life', its poetry and its eloquence. Another voice too there was, a voice from the other side of the Atlantic—Emerson's, 'a clear and pure voice' which to Arnold, at least, brought 'a strain as new, and moving, and unforgettable, as the strain of Newman, or Carlyle, or Goethe', investing to his ear the names of Boston Bay and Concord with a sentiment akin to that which invested the names of Oxford and Weimar.

It was the modern, not the mediaeval, influences which prevailed with Matthew Arnold. Yet a wistful affection for the Oxford Movement always remained in him. 'Who will estimate', he wrote,<sup>1</sup> 'how much the currents of feeling created by Dr. Newman's movement, the keen desire for beauty and sweetness which it nourished, the deep aversion it manifested to the hardness and vulgarity of middle-class liberalism, the strong light it turned on the hideous and grotesque illusions of middle-class Protestantism,—who will estimate how much all these contributed to swell the tide of secret dissatisfaction which has mined the ground under the self-confident liberalism of the last thirty years, and has prepared the way for its sudden collapse and supersession? It is in this manner that the sentiment of Oxford for beauty and sweetness conquers, and in this manner long may it continue to conquer!' Though he held the Cardinal's solution of the doubts and difficulties which beset men's minds to be 'frankly impossible', for Newman the writer he always retained a deep admiration. He speaks of him in Essays in Criticism as 'a man never to be named by any son of Oxford without sympathy, a man who alone in Oxford of his generation, alone of many generations, conveyed to us in his genius that same charm, that same ineffable sentiment, which this exquisite place itself conveys' (p. 49).

Arnold sings of himself in 'Stanzas from the Grande Chartreuse', as 'Wandering between two worlds, one dead,

The other powerless to be born,
With nowhere yet to rest my head.'

In him, as he wrote in his third sonnet on Rachel,

'there clashed contending powers,
Germany, France, Christ, Moses, Athens, Rome,' there was ever a strife, a mixture, in his soul. It is this conflict which gives the Essays in Criticism their peculiar interest and charm. Though he threw himself decidedly upon the modern side—the side of free criticism, of religious and political liberalism—some of his best prose, like his finest verse, has an elegiac note, a certain wistfulness, when he touches on the past. In Essays in Criticism this wistfulness appears most in the Preface, but it may be noticed too when he is speaking of the Roman Catholic Church in the papers on ‘The Literary Influence of Academies’, on the Guérins, on ‘Pagan and Mediaeval Religious Sentiment’, and on Joubert. There is here something of the Tractarian temper, the sweet austerity of Newman and Church, and a feeling for the nobleness and amplitude, the grace and dignity of Catholicism—a spiritual discipline for which the modern world has found no adequate substitute.

<sup>1</sup> Culture and Anarchy (1869), p. 38.

The intensely religious and even devotional, though undogmatic, spirit of Arnold is shown in his Notebooks from 1852 onwards.<sup>1</sup> They are full of passages from Roman Catholic writers, and in 1863, especially, his thoughts seem to have turned towards the Church: we find quotations from Lacordaire, Cardinal Wiseman, Newman, Manning, the Dublin Review—the passage which heads the essay on ‘Pagan and Mediaeval Religious Sentiment’—and the Provincial of the Order of Passionists in England.

‘The man of imagination,’ he says in Essays in Criticism (p. 144), ‘nay, and the philosopher too, in spite of her propensity to burn him, will always have a weakness for the Catholic Church; because of the rich treasures of human life which have been stored within her pale.’ Yet he insists on the sterility, in the modern world at any rate, of the ascetic ideal, ‘the doctrine of the emptiness and nothingness of human life, . . . which makes effort for things on this side of the grave a folly, and joy in things on this side of the grave a sin’ (p. 107); and in a different direction he sees that 'Catholicism appears to be bent on widening the breach between itself and the modern spirit, to be fatally losing itself in the multiplication of dogmas, Mariolatry, and miracle-mongering', while 'Protestantism has a future before it, a prospect of growth in alliance with the vital movement of modern society' (p. 106). Later, however, he came to think differently. 'I persist in thinking', he wrote in 1878,<sup>1</sup> 'that Catholicism has . . . a great future before it; that it will endure while all the Protestant sects (in which I do not include the Church of England) dissolve and perish. I persist in thinking that the prevailing form for the Christianity of the future will be the form of Catholicism; but a Catholicism purged, opening itself to the light and air, having the consciousness of its own poetry, freed from its sacerdotal despotism, and freed from its pseudo-scientific apparatus of superannuated dogma.'

<sup>1</sup> Matthew Arnold's Notebooks, edited by his Sister (1902).

Mark Pattison, in a striking passage in his Memoirs,<sup>2</sup> tells how Dean Stanley once said to him, 'How different the fortunes of the Church of England might have been if Newman had been able to read German'. 'That', says Pattison, 'puts the matter in a nutshell; Newman assumed and adorned the narrow basis on which Laud had stood two hundred years before. All the grand development of human reason, from Aristotle down to Hegel, was closed to him. There lay a unity, a unity of all thought, which far transcended the mere mechanical association of the unthinking members of the Catholic Church, a great spiritual unity, by the side of which all sects and denominations shrink into vanity.'

Later<sup>3</sup> Pattison tells how the secession of Newman in 1845 cleared the air in Oxford, and how he himself 'passed out of the Catholic phase, but slowly, and in many years, to that highest development when all religions appear in their historical light, as efforts of the human spirit to come to an understanding with that Unseen Power whose presence it feels, but whose motives are a riddle'. Pattison was an older man than Arnold, and had breathed the Oxford atmosphere too long to pass easily from Tractarianism to the wider catholicism. To Arnold, probably, the Oxford Movement, though it attracted him morally and aesthetically, never made much appeal on the intellectual side; as he himself says of Heine, he 'is not conquered by the Middle Age, he has a talisman by which he can feel—along with but above the power of the fascinating Middle Age itself—the power of modern ideas' (p. 128). 'That vast mine of ideas' Arnold calls Germany, and it was upon Germany very largely that he, like Pattison, unlike Newman, drew for his spiritual enlargement. It was not the Hegelian philosophy—a will-o'-the-wisp, as some would say, to many Oxford men—that attracted him, but Goethe and Heine, the great liberators, and the critical scholarship of 'the scientific, serious German spirit'. In Goethe he saw 'the clearest, the largest, the most helpful thinker of modern times', and in Heine 'a brilliant soldier in the war of the liberation of humanity'.

<sup>1</sup> Mixed Essays (second edition, 1880), pp. 120-1.

<sup>2</sup> Edition of 1885, p. 210.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., p. 327.

Another of the influences which went to form him in his undergraduate days is touched upon by Arnold in Culture and Anarchy.<sup>1</sup> 'Having been brought up at Oxford,' he says, 'in the bad old times, when we were stuffed with Greek and Aristotle, . . . my head is still full of a lumber of phrases we learnt at Oxford from Aristotle, about virtue being in a mean, and about excess and defect, and so on.' His idea of 'culture' as aiming at a 'true human perfection, a harmonious perfection, developing all sides of our humanity; and a general perfection developing all parts of our society', is partly at least derived from the Greeks. Arnold believed with Baron Bunsen that 'our great business was to get rid of all that was purely Semitic in Christianity, and to make it Indo-Germanic', and held with Schleiermacher that 'in the Christianity of us Western nations there was really much more of Plato and Socrates than of Joshua and David'. In this insistence on the importance of Hellenism he regarded himself as following his father, who 'on the whole worked in the direction of these ideas . . . and was perhaps the only powerful Englishman of his day who did so'.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Edition of 1869, p. 73.

The antithesis of 'Hellenism' and 'Hebraism' is much insisted on in Matthew Arnold's later works; in Essays in Criticism it is merely suggested. Perhaps the best account of his conception of the two forces is found in Culture and Anarchy: 'The uppermost idea with Hellenism is to see things as they really are; the uppermost idea with Hebraism is conduct and obedience.<sup>2</sup> . . . by alternations of Hebraism and Hellenism, of man's intellectual and moral impulses, of the effort to see things as they really are, and the effort to win peace by self-conquest, the human spirit proceeds.'<sup>3</sup>

Arnold's classical scholarship and tastes—the fruit of Winchester, Rugby, and Oxford—appear in Essays in Criticism in the delightful study of the fifteenth idyll of Theocritus, in the appreciation of the Greek poets from Pindar to Sophocles, and in the essay on Marcus Aurelius; they also affected his whole outlook and style, his love for perfection of form, precise expression, moderation, harmony, and balance. Against caprice, the 'eternal enemy' of excellent work in literature, Arnold fought throughout his life. His own age seemed to him, as he wrote in his Preface of 1853, 'an age wanting in moral grandeur . . . , and an age of spiritual discomfort'. 'In the sincere endeavour to learn and practise, amid the bewildering confusion of our times, what is sound and true in poetical art,' he says, 'I seemed to myself to find the only sure guidance, the only solid footing, among the ancients. They at least knew what they wanted in Art, and we do not.' Commerce with the ancients he believed to produce 'in those who constantly practise it, a steadying and composing effect upon their judgment, not of literary works only, but of men and events in general. They are like persons who have had a very weighty and impressive experience; they are more truly than others under the empire of facts, and more independent of the language current among those with whom they live. They wish neither to applaud nor to revile their age; they wish to know what it is, what it can give them, and whether this is what they want.'

<sup>1</sup> Letters, vol. i, p. 381.

<sup>2</sup> Culture and Anarchy (1869), p. 145.

<sup>3</sup> Ibid., p. 159.

The ideal of a full, balanced, and harmonious culture, developing in due proportion every side of our nature, dominates all Arnold's thought on religion, literature, politics, education, and social life in general. He is in fundamental opposition to early-Victorian individualism. The Industrial Revolution had had the effect of imposing upon the English middle-classes an education either pedantic or crudely utilitarian, a narrow and warped Puritanical religion, and a superficial code of morals in which good manners, intellectual cultivation, and the finer shades of ethical feeling counted for little. Instead of a spirit of general elevation and enlightenment he found a vulgar and sullen optimism, the boasted progress in mechanical science, for example, serving only to convey his countrymen more rapidly than before from 'an illiberal, dismal life at Islington to an illiberal, dismal life at Camberwell'.<sup>1</sup> There was much stress laid on sturdy self-help, free competition, and the blessings of party government, but little on the idea of the community as a whole, and the State, the Church, education, and literature, as unifying and civilizing forces. And withal, there was an immense and irritating self-satisfaction, a complacent Philistinism which found literary expression in the writings of Lord Macaulay.

<sup>1</sup> Friendship's Garland (second edition, 1897), p. 146.

Arnold, in the Preface to the Essays (p. 5), speaks of himself as trying 'to pull out a few more stops in that powerful but at present somewhat narrow-toned organ, the modern Englishman'. The great English middle-class, as he says in the essay on Heine (p. 130), had 'entered the prison of Puritanism, and had the key turned on its spirit there for two hundred years'. To help it to liberate itself was his great aim. Throughout the book he strikes the note of universality as against the sectarianism and complacent insularity of his fellow-countrymen. Carlyle and Ruskin had indeed done something to shake England from its spiritual torpor, but how much Puritan narrowness and intellectual and moral caprice remained in them! They had made men feel rather than reason: both were preachers, rhetoricians, word-painters, stirring men's emotions by rhythm and coloured imagery, and lashing their contemporaries with invective. They were eruptive volcanoes rather than steady luminaries. Arnold sought to shed a gentler light. 'I do not much believe', he once wrote of a popular preacher, 'in good being done by a man unless he can give light.'<sup>1</sup>

His own great aim was the correction of English opinion by bringing it into contact with European thought. Contemporary England and English literature appeared to him provincial and intellectually vulgar. The 'eruptive and aggressive spirit' of the English press compared with the urbanity of French newspapers, the eccentricity and arbitrariness of Colenso contrasted with Renan or Strauss, of Kinglake compared with Thiers, of Miss Tatham set against Eugénie de Guérin, these contrasts, shown forth in the Essays, were for Arnold so many symptoms of the evil. The remedy he proposed was Criticism, 'a disinterested endeavour to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world' (p. 33), a criticism which should regard 'Europe as being, for intellectual and spiritual purposes, one great confederation, bound to a joint action and working to a common result; and whose members have, for their proper outfit, a knowledge of Greek, Roman, and Eastern antiquity, and of one another' (p. 35).

<sup>1</sup> Letters, vol. ii, p. 90.

Arnold, as Professor Saintsbury has pointed out,<sup>1</sup> was the first English critic to urge systematically 'the importance, the necessity, of that comparative criticism of different literatures, the half-blind working of which had helped to create, if it had not actually created, the Romantic movement'. In England the knowledge of Spanish and Italian poetry and romance had largely disappeared, while enthusiasm for French literature had reacted into depreciation; European mediaeval literature was little appreciated, and German literature 'had been worshipped scarcely according to knowledge'.

Matthew Arnold's feeling for balance and harmony shows itself not merely in his veneration of the classics and Goethe but in his appreciation of the French prose-writers, and particularly of Sainte-Beuve, with his immense impartial curiosity, his 'ease of movement and charm of touch';<sup>2</sup> in his approval of the literary influence of academies; and in his condemnation of every kind of excess and lack of proportion. It led him even to depreciate some of the finest passages in Shakespeare and Keats, and it accounts for the characteristics of his own prose-style, his care for lucidity and ease rather than ornament, his urbanity, and what Mr. Arthur Symons has rather cruelly called his 'mincing neatness'.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> A History of English Criticism (1911), p. 488.

<sup>2</sup> Essays by Matthew Arnold (Oxford University Press, 1914), p. 484.

The sense of the intimate connexion of literature with social life is peculiarly French: Sainte-Beuve, like Taine and Jusserand, possessed it in a high degree, and Arnold, having caught something of it from his master, insists again and again in the Essays on the importance of a social atmosphere, a milieu favourable to 'a high, correct standard' (p. 48) and to 'a conscience in intellectual matters' (p. 41). 'In France,' he quotes Sainte-Beuve as saying, 'the first consideration for us is not whether we are amused by a work of art or mind, nor is it whether we are touched by it. What we seek above all to learn is, whether we were right in being amused with it, and in applauding it, and being moved by it' (p. 41). By his attempt to lay down principles of criticism in an age of self-assertion and caprice, Arnold performed a great service to literature, though in his statement and application of principles he was not always consistent.

The Essays in Criticism, for all their tone of bantering persiflage, at times not sufficiently 'of the centre', form the first coherent body of serious literary criticism in England since Hazlitt, with a width of range and a wealth of allusion far surpassing those of any earlier critic. The discursive method of treatment borrowed by Arnold from Sainte-Beuve, that of the causerie and the portrait littéraire, provided a ready means of reflex criticism: with the subject of the Essay he frequently contrasted some writer or tendency disliked by him at home, and was not seldom led to disparage unduly the one through too exalted praise of the other. While he insists many times upon the need for justness of spirit in the critic, and freedom from self-will and eccentricity, a certain arbitrariness of judgment is the very fault most noticeable in his own critical work, as when, for example, a dislike of French poetry in general and of the Alexandrine in particular leads him to depreciate any attempt of 'French people of genius to try and express themselves in verse' (p. 132). Again, his excessive appreciation of foreign and especially French criticism, induced him to reproduce, as authoritative and final, opinions fugitively expressed in periodical magazines, simply, it would seem, because they were French and not English. But defects of this kind, even inaccuracies in some statements of fact, have importance only as marking the need for caution in accepting certain of Arnold's critical judgments; they cannot impair the stimulating value of his work.

<sup>1</sup> Studies in Two Literatures (1897), p. 171.

From the French proneness to excessive system, exemplified in Nisard, Taine, and Brunetière but not in Sainte-Beuve—who, by the way, had an English mother and read much English literature as a boy—Arnold certainly did not suffer: he was always, like Sainte-Beuve, impatient of abstractions, anxious to keep in close touch with life and individuality, fearful of falling in bondage to an idea, though he loved ideas and rallied his contemporaries on their inaccessibility to them.

He knew little of physical science, and was at times inclined to depreciate it, but he realized the importance of the scientific attitude. The love of truth was his inspiration; though his interest was in human nature, not in mathematical or logical abstractions, he was constantly preaching the virtue of intellectual disinterestedness,—'a free play of the mind on all subjects which it touches' (p. 21). Criticism, he insisted, should steadily refuse to lend itself to ulterior practical considerations. He was, however, himself very much an Englishman, and an Englishman is always, as he tells us, 'a political animal': his own disinterestedness had limits, it never attained to real detachment. The son of Dr. Arnold, he was too ethical, too domesticated, too 'gentlemanly', too much a product of Rugby and Oxford, to explore with much understanding the wilder sides of human nature: he had not the dispassionate sceptical curiosity of Taine, much less of Sainte-Beuve, Renan, Anatole France, or Remy de Gourmont. Though he took Sainte-Beuve as his master in criticism and extolled him as a 'naturalist carrying into letters, so often the mere domain of rhetoric and futile amusement, the ideas and methods of scientific natural inquiry',<sup>1</sup> one feels deficiencies in Arnold's treatment of such 'disrespectable' personalities as Shelley and Heine. And, in another direction, with all his strivings after justice, it is at least doubtful if he was really fair to Victorian Dissenters or sufficiently critical of the Established Church of England. 'To see things as they really are' was unquestionably his great aim, but he did not always succeed in dispelling the mists of his own prejudices.

'Ideas', says Mr. J. M. Robertson in his study of Matthew Arnold,<sup>2</sup> 'always reached him aesthetically.' This is perhaps true if the word 'aesthetically' is meant to include a feeling for intellectual and moral beauty. 'Beauty and light', says Arnold in the essay on Joubert, 'are properties of truth, and truth is incompletely exhibited if it is exhibited without beauty and light' (p. 176), while no reader of this volume can fail to note the immense stress he lays on ethical nobility and harmony, the beauty of saintliness and heroism—a philosopher, to be great, he says, 'must have something in him which can influence character, which is edifying' (p. 215). To say that Arnold apprehended ideas poetically would certainly be just: with all his insistence on 'facts' and clear thinking he had the mind of a poet rather than a logician. 'The truth is,' he wrote in the Preface to the first edition of the Essays, 'I have never been able to hit it off happily with the logicians, and it would be mere affectation in me to give myself the airs of doing so. They imagine truth something to be proved, I something to be seen.'

<sup>1</sup> Essays by Matthew Arnold (Oxford University Press, 1914), p. 484.

<sup>2</sup> Modern Humanists (fourth edition, 1908), p. 141.

Even in his literary criticism, Arnold was better at 'seizing characteristic aspects' than at 'giving a logical analysis or a convincing proof'.<sup>1</sup> Curiously enough, like many intuitionists, he often fell into a sort of pseudo-logic, inventing catchwords, treating them as if they were scientific definitions, repeating them again and again, and running them to death. In his religious philosophy he tested the value of doctrines by their practical effects in furthering or hindering the vigour or harmony of the moral life. This attitude, though more clearly shown in his later works, is suggested in the Essays by his approval of Joubert's saying that religious truths should not be brought into the domain of reasoning (p. 178), by his remark that 'a philosopher's real power over mankind resides not in his metaphysical formulas, but in the spirit and tendencies which have led him to adopt those formulas' (p. 209), by his praise of Spinoza for his power of edification—all-important in the sphere of religious thought—and by his eulogies of the Roman Church as a consoling and refining influence.

If to Sainte-Beuve's universal sceptical curiosity and freedom from enthusiasms he never attained, and perhaps for all his talk about 'disinterestedness' never really desired to attain, he had to a considerable degree Sainte-Beuve's other virtues, moderation, balance, and suppleness, though not his erudition. Indeed, as in the Celtic Literature (1867) and in his theological books, he often undertook critical work without an adequate foundation of scholarship. That he was a hard-worked school-inspector for most of his life must, of course, not be forgotten.

<sup>1</sup> Leslie Stephen, Studies of a Biographer (1898), vol. ii, p. 92.

While he did not always act upon it, his caution against confounding literary and moral or political judgments—his insistence on the free play of the mind—was profoundly valuable for his time. Anything but an apostle of ‘Art for Art’s sake’ in an anti-moral sense, he did nevertheless recognize and appreciate literary beauty and charm in and for themselves. This is most evident in the essays on ‘The Literary Influence of Academies’ and on the Guérins—though many critics regret that he did not find subjects more important than the brother and sister whom, following Sainte-Beuve, he praised so highly. In the ‘Maurice de Guérin’ he comes nearer to pure aesthetics than in the other papers, and approaches in some degree the standpoint of his successor in criticism at Oxford, Walter Pater. He is here more occupied with the ‘form’ and feelings than with the ideas of the writer, more with poetic impressions and the words by which they are conveyed than with any ‘message’ which Guérin has to deliver.

Even in poetry, Arnold always insisted on the importance of subject as well as treatment. ‘It is a pity’, he wrote in the Advertisement to the second edition of his Poems, that the poet ‘should be compelled to impart interest and force to his subject, instead of receiving them from it, and thereby doubling his impressiveness.’ In his own poems the matter is often better than the form; with all its ‘high seriousness’, its fine thought and austere sincerity, his verse is too often lacking both in colour and in melody. Only at times—mostly when there is a touch of elegiac pathos—has it that ‘magical power’, that ‘exquisite felicity’, which he praised in Maurice de Guérin: the sensuous elements are apt to be over-balanced by intellectual and moral ‘criticism of life’. Without the dramatic power of Browning or the harmonious sweetness of Tennyson, Arnold’s poetry wears better than theirs, however, when there is question of philosophy; his austere stoicism is more satisfying than their confident Victorian optimism. His poetry expresses more directly, probably, the inner feeling of the man than his prose, and reveals him as Pagan rather than Christian, though he looked with a certain longing to the saints and the mystics. Serenity—or at least a striving after it—self-dependence, courage, rather than exultant faith and ecstatic worship, are its key-notes. The words he uses of Marcus Aurelius seem singularly true of himself: the spirit of his work is ‘a spirit, not so much of gladness and elation, as of gentleness and sweetness; a delicate and tender sentiment, which is less than joy and more than resignation. . . . We see him wise, just, self-governed, tender, thankful, blameless; yet, with all this, agitated, stretching out his arms for something beyond’ (pp. 233, 241).

Of Arnold’s writings after Essays in Criticism something has already been said. They cannot here be dealt with in much detail. In 1867 he published an important volume of New Poems. On the Study of Celtic Literature (1867), though an attractive and at first sight suggestive book, is perhaps the least satisfactory of his experiments in criticism. Based on totally insufficient knowledge of the subject, it has done a good deal to foster misleading theories as to ‘racial’ influences in literature. In Culture and Anarchy (1869), and Friendship’s Garland (1871), Arnold discussed English society in general, and criticized the religion, politics, education, and even the amusements of his fellow-countrymen, contrasting English life and manners with those of the Continent, and urging a higher view of the function of the State. Friendship's Garland is his wittiest and most amusing book, and its comparison of English and German ideals in politics and education is of peculiar interest. An enlightened Whig in politics, he did more to set men thinking of the defects of the existing state of things than to suggest positive and constructive measures. He was a great breaker-up of catchwords and prejudices, the outcome of intellectual laziness. He believed search and discovery to be, for his generation, of even more vital and pressing importance than immediate practical reforms. Yet he hated anarchy and disorder 'because without order there can be no society, and without society there can be no human perfection'.<sup>1</sup> Hence his reverence, critical though it was, for the State, the Church, and the ancient University of which he was the son. 'Freedom, like Industry,' he pointed out, 'is a very good horse to ride; but to ride somewhere.'<sup>2</sup>

From about 1870 to 1877 Matthew Arnold passed through a predominantly theological period and produced four works on religion: St. Paul and Protestantism (1870), Literature and Dogma (1873), God and the Bible (1875), and Last Essays on Church and Religion (1877). Many of his admirers regret his excursions into theology, and the value of these works has been differently judged according to men's ecclesiastical or other prepossessions. While containing many passages of beauty and insight they are often subjective and arbitrary in their critical conclusions and interpretations of the Bible, and large parts of them are concerned with past phases of controversy.

In his last decade Matthew Arnold returned to general literature, politics, and culture, and the years from 1879 to his death in 1888 saw the publication of some rather miscellaneous volumes—Mixed Essays (1879), Irish Essays and Others (1882), Discourses in America (1885), and Civilization in the United States (1888). In 1883 and 1886 he had visited America, meeting many prominent people and delivering lectures in various cities. A second series of Essays in Criticism was published in 1888, after his death, but chosen and collected by himself. The essays included were: 'The Study of Poetry' (the well-known Preface to Mr. T. Humphry Ward's English Poets), 'Milton', 'Thomas Gray', 'John Keats', 'Wordsworth', 'Byron', 'Shelley', 'Count Leo Tolstoy', and 'Amiel'; and in this volume is to be found some of his best literary criticism. A few fine poems, too, like 'Westminster Abbey' (1882)—memorial lines on his friend Dean Stanley—belong to his later years.

<sup>1</sup> Culture and Anarchy, p. 258.

<sup>2</sup> Friendship's Garland, p. 147.

Arnold retired from his official work in 1886. In 1883 Mr. Gladstone had conferred upon him a Civil List pension, 'as a public recognition of service to the poetry and literature of England'. He died suddenly on April 15, 1888, and is buried in Laleham churchyard.

The charm of Arnold's character is well suggested by a writer of very different temperament and training, Leslie Stephen. 'He had', says Stephen,<sup>1</sup> who knew him personally, 'that obvious sweetness of nature, which it is impossible not to recognize and not to love. Though in controversy he took and gave many shrewd blows, he always received them with a courtesy, indicative not of mere policy or literary tact, but of dislike to inflicting pain and of incapacity for hating any tolerably decent antagonist in flesh and blood. He was on excellent terms with the classes whose foibles he ridiculed most unsparingly, and even his own foibles were attractive.'

Again, his friend Mr. G. W. E. Russell, in a recent book

<sup>1</sup> Op. cit., vol. ii, p. 78.

of memories,<sup>1</sup> speaks of him as 'the most delightful of companions; a man of the world entirely free from worldliness, and a man of letters without the faintest trace of pedantry. . . . If Arnold entered a company in which he was not known, the first impression would be that the newcomer was a man of high distinction, though in what direction it might have been hard to guess; the second, that he was conscious of his eminence. In half an hour's time the first impression would have been intensified, but the second would have been dissipated by the charm of his address, his fun, his affectionateness, and his eager interest in his friends' concerns.'

If Matthew Arnold's writings sometimes seem commonplace nowadays, that is largely because he was so skilful an inventor or adapter of labels and phrases which have become current coin in England, and because so much of his teaching has been generally accepted. The excessive repetition of phrases which he believed to hit the mark is the greatest fault of his prose-style. At first, perhaps, a natural tendency, and due to a certain lack of abundance in ideas, he seems to have practised it deliberately in order to impress his views on the public, until it grew into a distressing mannerism. It is unfortunate, too, for the permanent attractiveness and intelligibility of his work that he so often drags in living persons to illustrate his principles: even in Essays in Criticism there is too much of contemporary debate. It is not, however, the object of this Introduction to point out his defects, but to help the reader to a clearer understanding of his purpose in the Essays and of the services which he rendered to his time. 'He did much', as Mr. Frederic Harrison says,<sup>2</sup> 'to kill a great deal of flashy writing and much vulgarity that once had a curious vogue.' If the standard of English in current writing, the taste of the day in prose and verse, is higher now than in mid-Victorian England, this is in no small degree due to Arnold's critical work.

<sup>1</sup> Portraits of the Seventies (1916), pp. 294-6.

<sup>2</sup> Tennyson, Ruskin, Mill, and other Literary Estimates (1899), p. 126.

C. A. MILES.

ESSAYS IN CRITICISM

1865

[Reprinted from Second Edition, 1869]

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

1961

LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

PREFACE TO SECOND EDITION

(1869)

SEVERAL of the Essays which are here collected and reprinted had the good or the bad fortune to be much criticised at the time of their first appearance. I am not now going to inflict upon the reader a reply to those criticisms; for one or two explanations which are desirable, I shall elsewhere, perhaps, be able some day to find an opportunity; but, indeed, it is not in my nature,—some of my critics would rather say, not in my power,—to dispute on behalf of any opinion, even my own, very obstinately. To try and approach truth on one side after another, not to strive or cry, nor to persist in pressing forward, on any one side, with violence and self-will,—it is only thus, it seems to me, that mortals may hope to gain any vision of the mysterious Goddess, whom we shall never see except in outline, but only thus even in outline. He who will do nothing but fight impetuously towards her on his own, one, favourite, particular line, is inevitably destined to run his head into the folds of the black robe in which she is wrapped.

So it is not to reply to my critics that I write this preface, but to prevent a misunderstanding, of which certain phrases that some of them use make me apprehensive. Mr. Wright, one of the many translators of Homer, has published a Letter to the Dean of Canterbury, complaining of some remarks of mine, uttered now a long while ago, on his version of the Iliad. One cannot be always studying one's own works, and I was really under the impression, till I saw Mr. Wright's complaint, that I had spoken of him with all respect. The reader may judge of my astonishment, therefore, at finding, from Mr. Wright's pamphlet, that I had 'declared with much solemnity that there is not any proper reason for his existing.' That I never said; but, on looking back at my Lectures on translating Homer, I find that I did say, not that Mr. Wright, but that Mr. Wright's version of the Iliad, repeating in the main the merits and defects of Cowper's version, as Mr. Sotheby's repeated those of Pope's version, had, if I might be pardoned for saying so, no proper reason for existing. Elsewhere I expressly spoke of the merit of his version; but I confess that the phrase, qualified as I have shown, about its want of a proper reason for existing, I used. Well, the phrase had, perhaps, too much vivacity; we have all of us a right to exist, we and our works; an unpopular author should be the last person to call in question this right. So I gladly withdraw the offending phrase, and I am sorry for having used it; Mr. Wright, however, would perhaps be more indulgent to my vivacity, if he considered that we are none of us likely to be lively much longer. My vivacity is but the last sparkle of flame before we are all in the dark, the last glimpse of colour before we all go into drab,—the drab of the earnest, prosaic, practical, austere literal future. Yes, the world will soon be the Philistines'! and then, with every voice, not of thunder, silenced, and the whole earth filled and ennobled every morning by the magnificent roaring of the young lions of the Daily Telegraph, we shall all yawn in one another's faces with the dimmest, the most unimpeachable gravity.

But I return to my design in writing this Preface. That design was, after apologising to Mr. Wright for my vivacity of five years ago, to beg him and others to let me bear my own burdens, without saddling the great and famous University, to which I have the honour to belong, with any portion of them. What I mean to deprecate is such phrases as, 'his professorial assault,' 'his assertions issued ex cathedrâ,' 'the sanction of his name as the representative of poetry,' and so on. Proud as I am of my connection with the University of Oxford,<sup>1</sup> I can truly say, that knowing how unpopular a task one is undertaking when one tries to pull out a few more stops in that powerful but at present somewhat narrow-toned organ, the modern Englishman, I have always sought to stand by myself, and to compromise others as little as possible. Besides this, my native modesty is such, that I have always been shy of assuming the honourable style of Professor, because this is a title I share with so many distinguished men,—Professor Pepper, Professor Anderson, Professor Frickel, and others,—who adorn it, I feel, much more than I do.

However, it is not merely out of modesty that I prefer to stand alone, and to concentrate on myself, as a plain citizen of the republic of letters, and not as an office-bearer in a hierarchy, the whole responsibility for all I write; it is much more out of genuine devotion to the University of Oxford, for which I feel, and always must feel, the fondest, the most reverential attachment. In an epoch of dissolution and transformation, such as that on which we are now entered, habits, ties, and associations are inevitably broken up, the action of individuals becomes more distinct, the shortcomings, errors, heats, disputes, which necessarily attend individual action, are brought into greater prominence. Who would not gladly keep clear, from all these passing clouds, an august institution which was there before they arose, and which will be there when they have blown over?

<sup>1</sup> When the above was written the author still had the Chair of Poetry at Oxford, which he has since vacated.

It is true, the Saturday Review maintains that our epoch of transformation is finished; that we have found our philosophy; that the British nation has searched all anchorages for the spirit, and has finally anchored itself, in the fulness of perfected knowledge, on Benthamism. This idea at first made a great impression on me; not only because it is so consoling in itself, but also because it explained a phenomenon which in the summer of last year had, I confess, a good deal troubled me. At that time my avocations led me to travel almost daily on one of the Great Eastern Lines,—the Woodford Branch. Every one knows that the murderer, Müller, perpetrated his detestable act on the North London Railway, close by. The English middle class, of which I am myself a feeble unit, travel on the Woodford Branch in large numbers. Well, the demoralisation of our class,—the class which (the newspapers are constantly saying it, so I may repeat it without vanity) has done all the great things which have ever been done in England,—the demoralisation, I say, of our class, caused by the Bow tragedy, was something bewildering. Myself a transcendentalist (as the Saturday Review knows), I escaped the infection; and, day after day, I used to ply my agitated fellow-travellers with all the consolations which my transcendentalism would naturally suggest to me. I reminded them how Caesar refused to take precautions against assassination, because life was not worth having at the price of an ignoble solicitude for it. I reminded them what insignificant atoms we all are in the life of the world. ‘Suppose the worst to happen,’ I said, addressing a portly jeweller from Cheapside; ‘suppose even yourself to be the victim; il n’y a pas d’homme nécessaire. We should miss you for a day or two upon the Woodford Branch; but the great mundane movement would still go on, the gravel walks of your villa would still be rolled, dividends would still be paid at the Bank, omnibuses would still run, there would still be the old crush at the corner of Fenchurch Street.' All was of no avail. Nothing could moderate, in the bosom of the great English middle class, their passionate, absorbing, almost blood-thirsty clinging to life. At the moment I thought this over-concern a little unworthy; but the Saturday Review suggests a touching explanation of it. What I took for the ignoble clinging to life of a comfortable worldling, was, perhaps, only the ardent longing of a faithful Benthamite, traversing an age still dimmed by the last mists of transcendentalism, to be spared long enough to see his religion in the full and final blaze of its triumph. This respectable man, whom I imagined to be going up to London to serve his shop, or to buy shares, or to attend an Exeter Hall meeting, or to assist at the deliberations of the Marylebone Vestry, was, perhaps, in real truth, on a pious pilgrimage, to obtain from Mr. Bentham's executors a sacred bone of his great, dissected master.

And yet, after all, I cannot but think that the Saturday Review has here, for once, fallen a victim to an idea,—a beautiful but deluding idea,—and that the British nation has not yet, so entirely as the reviewer seems to imagine, found the last word of its philosophy. No, we are all seekers still! seekers often make mistakes, and I wish mine to redound to my own discredit only, and not to touch Oxford. Beautiful city! so venerable, so lovely, so unravaged by the fierce intellectual life of our century so serene!

'There are our young barbarians all at play!'

And yet, steeped in sentiment as she lies, spreading her gardens to the moonlight, and whispering from her towers the last enchantments of the Middle Age, who will deny that Oxford, by her ineffable charm, keeps ever calling us nearer to the true goal of all of us, to the ideal, to perfection,—to beauty, in a word, which is only truth seen from another side?—nearer, perhaps, than all the science of Tübingen. Adorable dreamer, whose heart has been so romantic! who hast given thyself so prodigally, given thyself to sides and to heroes not mine, only never to the Philistines! home of lost causes, and forsaken beliefs, and unpopular names, and impossible loyalties! what example could ever so inspire us to keep down the Philistine in ourselves, what teacher could ever so save us from that bondage to which we are all prone, that bondage which Goethe, in those incomparable lines on the death of Schiller, makes it his friend's highest praise (and nobly did Schiller deserve the praise) to have left miles out of sight behind him;—the bondage of 'was uns alle bündigt, DAS GEMEINE!' She will forgive me, even if I have unwittingly drawn upon her a shot or two aimed at her unworthy son; for she is generous, and the cause in which I fight is, after all, hers. Apparitions of a day, what is our puny warfare against the Philistines, compared with the warfare which this queen of romance has been waging against them for centuries, and will wage after we are gone?

THE FUNCTION OF CRITICISM AT THE PRESENT TIME

MANY objections have been made to a proposition which, in some remarks of mine on translating Homer, I ventured to put forth ; a proposition about criticism, and its importance at the present day. I said : ' Of the literature of France and Germany, as of the intellect of Europe in general, the main effort, for now many years, has been a critical effort ; the endeavour, in all branches of knowledge, theology, philosophy, history, art, science, to see the object as in itself it really is.' I added, that owing 10 to the operation in English literature of certain causes, ' almost the last thing for which one would come to English literature is just that very thing which now Europe most desires,—criticism ;' and that the power and value of English literature was thereby impaired. More than one rejoinder declared that the importance I here assigned to criticism was excessive, and asserted the inherent superiority of the creative effort of the human spirit over its critical effort. And the other day, having been led by an excellent notice of Wordsworth<sup>1</sup> published in the North
20 British Review, to turn again to his biography, I found, in the words of this great man, whom I, for one, must always listen to with the profoundest respect, a sentence passed on the critic's business, which seems to justify <sup>1</sup> I cannot help thinking that a practice, common in England during the last century, and still followed in France, of printing a notice of this kind,—a notice by a competent critic,—to serve as an introduction to an eminent author's works, might be revived among us with advantage. To introduce all succeeding editions of Wordsworth, Mr. Shairp's notice (it is permitted, I hope, to mention his name) might, it seems to me, excellently serve ; it is written from the point of view of an admirer, nay, of a disciple, and that is right ; but then the disciple must be also, as in this case he is, a critic, a man of letters, not, as too often happens, some relation or friend with no qualification for his task except affection for his author.

every possible disparagement of it. Wordsworth says in one of his letters :—

‘The writers in these publications’ (the Reviews), ‘while they prosecute their inglorious employment, can not be supposed to be in a state of mind very favourable for being affected by the finer influences of a thing so pure as genuine poetry.’

And a trustworthy reporter of his conversation quotes a more elaborate judgment to the same effect :—

‘Wordsworth holds the critical power very low, infinitely 10 lower than the inventive ; and he said to-day that if the quantity of time consumed in writing critiques on the works of others were given to original composition, of whatever kind it might be, it would be much better employed ; it would make a man find out sooner his own level, and it would do infinitely less mischief. A false or malicious criticism may do much injury to the minds of others ; a stupid invention, either in prose or verse, is quite harmless.’

It is almost too much to expect of poor human nature, 20 that a man capable of producing some effect in one line of literature, should, for the greater good of society, voluntarily doom himself to impotence and obscurity in another. Still less is this to be expected from men addicted to the composition of the ‘false or malicious criticism,’ of which Wordsworth speaks. However, everybody would admit that a false or malicious criticism had better never have been written. Everybody, too, would be willing to admit, as a general proposition, that the critical faculty is lower than the inventive. But is it true that criticism is really, 30 in itself, a baneful and injurious employment ; is it true that all time given to writing critiques on the works of others would be much better employed if it were given to original composition, of whatever kind this may be ? Is it true that Johnson had better have gone on producing more Irenes instead of writing his Lives of the Poets ; nay, is it certain that Wordsworth himself was better employed in making his Ecclesiastical Sonnets, than when he made his celebrated Preface, so full of criticism, and criticism of the works of others ? Wordsworth was himself a great 40 critic, and it is to be sincerely regretted that he has not left us more criticism ; Goethe was one of the greatest of critics, and we may sincerely congratulate ourselves that he has left us so much criticism. Without wasting time over the exaggeration which Wordsworth's judgment on criticism clearly contains, or over an attempt to trace the causes,—not difficult I think to be traced,—which may have led Wordsworth to this exaggeration, a critic may with advantage seize an occasion for trying his own conscience, and for asking himself of what real service, at any 10 given moment, the practice of criticism either is, or may be made, to his own mind and spirit, and to the minds and spirits of others.

The critical power is of lower rank than the creative. True ; but in assenting to this proposition, one or two things are to be kept in mind. It is undeniable that the exercise of a creative power, that a free creative activity, is the true function of man ; it is proved to be so by man's finding in it his true happiness. But it is undeniable, also, that men may have the sense of exercising this free 20 creative activity in other ways than in producing great works of literature or art ; if it were not so, all but a very few men would be shut out from the true happiness of all men ; they may have it in well-doing, they may have it in learning, they may have it even in criticising. This is one thing to be kept in mind. Another is, that the exercise of the creative power in the production of great works of literature or art, however high this exercise of it may rank, is not at all epochs and under all conditions possible ; and that therefore labour may be vainly spent 30 in attempting it, which might with more fruit be used in preparing for it, in rendering it possible. This creative power works with elements, with materials ; what if it has not those materials, those elements, ready for its use ? In that case it must surely wait till they are ready. Now in literature,—I will limit myself to literature, for it is about literature that the question arises,—the elements with which the creative power works are ideas ; the best ideas, on every matter which literature touches, current at the time ; at any rate we may lay it down as certain that in 40 modern literature no manifestation of the creative power not working with these can be very important or fruitful.

And I say current at the time, not merely accessible at the time ; for creative literary genius does not principally show itself in discovering new ideas ; that is rather the business of the philosopher : the grand work of literary genius is a work of synthesis and exposition, not of analysis and discovery ; its gift lies in the faculty of being happily inspired by a certain intellectual and spiritual atmosphere, by a certain order of ideas, when it finds itself in them ; of dealing divinely with these ideas, presenting them in the most effective and attractive combinations,—making 10 beautiful works with them, in short. But it must have the atmosphere, it must find itself amidst the order of ideas, in order to work freely ; and these it is not so easy to command. This is why great creative epochs in literature are so rare ; this is why there is so much that is unsatisfactory in the productions of many men of real genius ; because for the creation of a master-work of literature two powers must concur, the power of the man and the power of the moment, and the man is not enough without the moment ; the creative power has, for its 20 happy exercise, appointed elements, and those elements are not in its own control.

Nay, they are more within the control of the critical power. It is the business of the critical power, as I said in the words already quoted, ‘in all branches of knowledge, theology, philosophy, history, art, science, to see the object as in itself it really is.’ Thus it tends, at last, to make an intellectual situation of which the creative power can profitably avail itself. It tends to establish an order of ideas, if not absolutely true, yet true by com- 30 parison with that which it displaces ; to make the best ideas prevail. Presently these new ideas reach society, the touch of truth is the touch of life, and there is a stir and growth everywhere ; out of this stir and growth come the creative epochs of literature.

Or, to narrow our range, and quit these considerations of the general march of genius and of society, considerations which are apt to become too abstract and impalpable,—every one can see that a poet, for instance, ought to know life and the world before dealing with them in poetry ; 40 and life and the world being, in modern times, very complex things, the creation of a modern poet, to be worth much, implies a great critical effort behind it; else it must be a comparatively poor, barren, and short-lived affair. This is why Byron's poetry had so little endurance in it, and Goethe's so much; both Byron and Goethe had a great productive power, but Goethe's was nourished by a great critical effort providing the true materials for it, and Byron's was not; Goethe knew life and the world, the poet's necessary subjects, much more comprehensively and thoroughly than Byron. He knew a great deal more of them, and he knew them much more as they really are.

It has long seemed to me that the burst of creative activity in our literature, through the first quarter of this century, had about it, in fact, something premature; and that from this cause its productions are doomed, most of them, in spite of the sanguine hopes which accompanied and do still accompany them, to prove hardly more lasting than the productions of far less splendid epochs. And this prematureness comes from its having proceeded without having its proper data, without sufficient materials to work with. In other words, the English poetry of the first quarter of this century, with plenty of energy, plenty of creative force, did not know enough. This makes Byron so empty of matter, Shelley so incoherent, Wordsworth even, profound as he is, yet so wanting in completeness and variety. Wordsworth cared little for books, and disparaged Goethe. I admire Wordsworth, as he is, so much that I cannot wish him different; and it is vain, no doubt, to imagine such a man different from what he is, to suppose that he could have been different; but surely the one thing wanting to make Wordsworth an even greater poet than he is,—his thought richer, and his influence of wider application,—was that he should have read more books, among them, no doubt, those of that Goethe whom he disparaged without reading him.

But to speak of books and reading may easily lead to a misunderstanding here. It was not really books and reading that lacked to our poetry, at this epoch; Shelley had plenty of reading, Coleridge had immense reading. Pindar and Sophocles—as we all say so glibly, and often with so little discernment of the real import of what we are saying—had not many books; Shakspeare was no deep reader. True; but in the Greece of Pindar and Sophocles, in the England of Shakspeare, the poet lived in a current of ideas in the highest degree animating and nourishing to the creative power; society was, in the fullest measure, permeated by fresh thought, intelligent and alive; and this state of things is the true basis for the creative power's exercise,—in this it finds its data, its materials, truly ready for its hand; all the books and 10 reading in the world are only valuable as they are helps to this. Even when this does not actually exist, books and reading may enable a man to construct a kind of semblance of it in his own mind, a world of knowledge and intelligence in which he may live and work: this is by no means an equivalent, to the artist, for the nationally diffused life and thought of the epochs of Sophocles or Shakspeare, but, besides that it may be a means of preparation for such epochs, it does really constitute, if many share in it, a quickening and sustaining atmosphere of 20 great value. Such an atmosphere the many-sided learning and the long and widely-combined critical effort of Germany formed for Goethe, when he lived and worked. There was no national glow of life and thought there, as in the Athens of Pericles, or the England of Elizabeth. That was the poet's weakness. But there was a sort of equivalent for it in the complete culture and unfettered thinking of a large body of Germans. That was his strength. In the England of the first quarter of this century, there was neither a national glow of life and thought, such as we had in the 30 age of Elizabeth, nor yet a culture and a force of learning and criticism, such as were to be found in Germany. Therefore the creative power of poetry wanted, for success in the highest sense, materials and a basis; a thorough interpretation of the world was necessarily denied to it.

At first sight it seems strange that out of the immense stir of the French Revolution and its age should not have come a crop of works of genius equal to that which came out of the stir of the great productive time of Greece, or out of that of the Renaissance, with its powerful episode 40 the Reformation. But the truth is that the stir of the French Revolution took a character which essentially distinguished it from such movements as these. These were, in the main, disinterestedly intellectual and spiritual movements; movements in which the human spirit looked for its satisfaction in itself and in the increased play of its own activity: the French Revolution took a political, practical character. The movement which went on in France under the old régime, from 1700 to 1789, was far more really akin than that of the Revolution itself to the 10 movement of the Renaissance; the France of Voltaire and Rousseau told far more powerfully upon the mind of Europe than the France of the Revolution. Goethe reproached this last expressly with having 'thrown quiet culture back.' Nay, and the true key to how much in our Byron, even in our Wordsworth, is this!—that they had their source in a great movement of feeling, not in a great movement of mind. The French Revolution, however,—that object of so much blind love and so much blind

20 hatred,—found undoubtedly its motive-power in the intelligence of men and not in their practical sense;—this is what distinguishes it from the English Revolution of Charles the First's time; this is what makes it a more spiritual event than our Revolution, an event of much more powerful and world-wide interest, though practically less successful;—it appeals to an order of ideas which are universal, certain, permanent. 1789 asked of a thing, Is it rational? 1642 asked of a thing, Is it legal? or, when it went furthest, Is it according to conscience? This is the English fashion; a fashion to be treated, within its own 30 sphere, with the highest respect; for its success, within its own sphere, has been prodigious. But what is law in one place, is not law in another; what is law here to-day, is not law even here to-morrow; and as for conscience, what is binding on one man's conscience is not binding on another's; the old woman who threw her stool at the head of the surpliced minister in St. Giles's Church at Edinburgh obeyed an impulse to which millions of the human race may be permitted to remain strangers. But the prescriptions of reason are absolute, unchanging, of here to the Antipodes, feels the force ; at least, I should say so, if we did not live in a country where it is not impossible that any morning we may find a letter in the Times declaring that a decimal coinage is an absurdity. That a whole nation should have been penetrated with an enthusiasm for pure reason, and with an ardent zeal for making its prescriptions triumph, is a very remarkable thing, when we consider how little of mind, or anything so worthy and quickening as mind, comes into the motives which alone, in general, impel great masses of men. In spite of the extravagant direction given to this enthusiasm, in spite of the crimes and follies in which it lost itself, the French Revolution derives from the force, truth, and universality of the ideas which it took for its law, and from the passion with which it could inspire a multitude for these ideas, a unique and still living power ; it is—it will probably long remain—the greatest, the most animating event in history. And, as no sincere passion for the things of the mind, even though it turn out in many respects an unfortunate passion, is ever quite thrown away and quite barren of good, France has reaped from hers one fruit, the natural and legitimate fruit, though not precisely the grand fruit she expected ; she is the country in Europe where the people is most alive.
40 universal validity; to count by tens is the easiest way of counting,—that is a proposition of which every one, from

But the mania for giving an immediate political and practical application to all these fine ideas of the reason was fatal. Here an Englishman is in his element : on this theme we can all go on for hours. And all we are in the habit of saying on it has undoubtedly a great deal of truth. Ideas cannot be too much prized in and for themselves, cannot be too much lived with ; but to transport them abruptly into the world of politics and practice, violently to revolutionise this world to their bidding,—that is quite another thing. There is the world of ideas and there is the world of practice ; the French are often for suppressing the one and the English the other ; but neither is to be suppressed. A member of the House of Commons said to me the other day : ‘ That a thing is an anomaly, I consider to be no objection to it whatever.’ I venture to think he was wrong ; that a thing is an anomaly is an objection to it, but absolutely and in the sphere of ideas : it is not necessarily, under such and such circumstances, or at such and such a moment, an objection to it in the sphere of politics and practice. Joubert has said beautifully: 'C'est la force et le droit qui règlent toutes choses dans le monde ; la force en attendant le droit.' (Force and right are the governors of this world ; force till right is ready.) Force till right is ready ; and till right is ready, force, the existing order of things, is justified, is the legitimate ruler. But right is something moral, and implies inward recognition, free assent of the will ; we are not ready for right,— 10 right, so far as we are concerned, is not ready,—until we have attained this sense of seeing it and willing it. The way in which for us it may change and transform force, the existing order of things, and become, in its turn, the legitimate ruler of the world, will depend on the way in which, when our time comes, we see it and will it. Therefore for other people enamoured of their own newly discerned right, to attempt to impose it upon us as ours, and violently to substitute their right for our force, is an act

 20 of tyranny, and to be resisted. It sets at nought the second great half of our maxim, force till right is ready. This was the grand error of the French Revolution ; and its movement of ideas, by quitting the intellectual sphere and rushing furiously into the political sphere, ran, indeed, a prodigious and memorable course, but produced no such intellectual fruit as the movement of ideas of the Renaissance, and created, in opposition to itself, what I may call an epoch of concentration. The great force of that epoch of concentration was England ; and the great voice of that 30 epoch of concentration was Burke. It is the fashion to treat Burke's writings on the French Revolution as superannuated and conquered by the event ; as the eloquent but unphilosophical tirades of bigotry and prejudice. I will not deny that they are often disfigured by the violence and passion of the moment, and that in some directions Burke's view was bounded, and his observation therefore at fault ; but on the whole, and for those who can make the needful corrections, what distinguishes these writings is their profound, permanent, fruitful, philosophical 40 truth ; they contain the true philosophy of an epoch of concentration, dissipate the heavy atmosphere which its own nature is apt to engender round it, and make its resistance rational instead of mechanical.

ARNOLD

C

But Burke is so great because, almost alone in England, he brings thought to bear upon politics, he saturates politics with thought; it is his accident that his ideas were at the service of an epoch of concentration, not of an epoch of expansion; it is his characteristic that he so lived by ideas, and had such a source of them welling up within him, that he could float even an epoch of concentration and English Tory politics with them. It does <sup>10</sup> not hurt him that Dr. Price and the Liberals were enraged with him; it does not even hurt him that George the Third and the Tories were enchanted with him. His greatness is that he lived in a world which neither English Liberalism nor English Toryism is apt to enter;—the world of ideas, not the world of catchwords and party habits. So far is it from being really true of him that he ‘to party gave up what was meant for mankind,’ that at the very end of his fierce struggle with the French Revolution, after all his invectives against its false pretensions, hollowness, and <sup>20</sup> madness, with his sincere conviction of its mischievousness, he can close a memorandum on the best means of combating it, some of the last pages he ever wrote,—the Thoughts on French Affairs, in December 1791,—with these striking words:—

‘The evil is stated, in my opinion, as it exists. The remedy must be where power, wisdom, and information, I hope, are more united with good intentions than they can be with me. I have done with this subject, I believe, for ever. It has given me many anxious moments for <sup>30</sup> the last two years. If a great change is to be made in human affairs, the minds of men will be fitted to it; the general opinions and feelings will draw that way. Every fear, every hope will forward it; and then they who persist in opposing this mighty current in human affairs, will appear rather to resist the decrees of Providence itself, than the mere designs of men. They will not be resolute and firm, but perverse and obstinate.’

That return of Burke upon himself has always seemed to me one of the finest things in English literature, or <sup>40</sup> indeed in any literature. That is what I call living by ideas ; when one side of a question has long had your earnest support, when all your feelings are engaged, when you hear all round you no language but one, when your party talks this language like a steam-engine and can imagine no other,—still to be able to think, still to be irresistibly carried, if so it be, by the current of thought to the opposite side of the question, and, like Balaam, to be unable to speak anything but what the Lord has put in your mouth. I know nothing more striking, and I must 10 add that I know nothing more un-English.

For the Englishman in general is like my friend the Member of Parliament, and believes, point-blank, that for a thing to be an anomaly is absolutely no objection to it whatever. He is like the Lord Auckland of Burke's day, who, in a memorandum on the French Revolution, talks of 'certain miscreants, assuming the name of philosophers, who have presumed themselves capable of establishing a new system of society.' The Englishman has been called a political animal, and he values what is 20 political and practical so much that ideas easily become objects of dislike in his eyes, and thinkers 'miscreants,' because ideas and thinkers have rashly meddled with politics and practice. This would be all very well if the dislike and neglect confined themselves to ideas transported out of their own sphere, and meddling rashly with practice ; but they are inevitably extended to ideas as such, and to the whole life of intelligence ; practice is everything, a free play of the mind is nothing. The notion of the free play of the mind upon all subjects being
30 a pleasure in itself, being an object of desire, being an essential provider of elements without which a nation's spirit, whatever compensations it may have for them, must, in the long run, die of inanition, hardly enters into an Englishman's thoughts. It is noticeable that the word curiosity, which in other languages is used in a good sense, to mean, as a high and fine quality of man's nature, just this disinterested love of a free play of the mind on all subjects, for its own sake,—it is noticeable, I say, that this word has in our language no sense of the kind, no 40 sense but a rather bad and disparaging one. But criticism, real criticism, is essentially the exercise of this very quality ;

it obeys an instinct prompting it to try to know the best that is known and thought in the world, irrespectively of practice, politics, and everything of the kind ; and to value knowledge and thought as they approach this best, without the intrusion of any other considerations whatever. This is an instinct for which there is, I think, little original sympathy in the practical English nature, and what there was of it has undergone a long benumbing period of blight and suppression in the epoch of concentration which followed the French Revolution.

10

But epochs of concentration cannot well endure for ever ; epochs of expansion, in the due course of things, follow them. Such an epoch of expansion seems to be opening in this country. In the first place all danger of a hostile forcible pressure of foreign ideas upon our practice has long disappeared ; like the traveller in the fable, therefore, we begin to wear our cloak a little more loosely. Then, with a long peace, the ideas of Europe steal gradually and amicably in, and mingle, though in infinitesimally small quantities at a time, with our own notions. Then, too, 20 in spite of all that is said about the absorbing and brutalising influence of our passionate material progress, it seems to me indisputable that this progress is likely, though not certain, to lead in the end to an apparition of intellectual life ; and that man, after he has made himself perfectly comfortable and has now to determine what to do with himself next, may begin to remember that he has a mind, and that the mind may be made the source of great pleasure. I grant it is mainly the privilege of faith, at present, to discern this end to our railways, our business, and our 30 fortune-making ; but we shall see if, here as elsewhere, faith is not in the end the true prophet. Our ease, our travelling, and our unbounded liberty to hold just as hard and securely as we please to the practice to which our notions have given birth, all tend to beget an inclination to deal a little more freely with these notions themselves, to canvass them a little, to penetrate a little into their real nature. Flutterings of curiosity, in the foreign sense of the word, appear amongst us, and it is in these that criticism must look to find its account. Criticism first ; 40 a time of true creative activity, perhaps,—which, as I have said, must inevitably be preceded amongst us by a time of criticism,—hereafter, when criticism has done its work.

It is of the last importance that English criticism should clearly discern what rule for its course, in order to avail itself of the field now opening to it, and to produce fruit for the future, it ought to take. The rule may be summed up in one word,—disinterestedness. And how is criticism to show disinterestedness? By keeping aloof from practice; by resolutely following the law of its own nature, which is 10 to be a free play of the mind on all subjects which it touches; by steadily refusing to lend itself to any of those ulterior, political, practical considerations about ideas which plenty of people will be sure to attach to them, which perhaps ought often to be attached to them, which in this country at any rate are certain to be attached to them quite sufficiently, but which criticism has really nothing to do with. Its business is, as I have said, simply to know the best that is known and thought in the world, and by in its turn making this known, to create a current of true and 20 fresh ideas. Its business is to do this with inflexible honesty, with due ability; but its business is to do no more, and to leave alone all questions of practical consequences and applications, questions which will never fail to have due prominence given to them. Else criticism, besides being really false to its own nature, merely continues in the old rut which it has hitherto followed in this country, and will certainly miss the chance now given to it. For what is at present the bane of criticism in this country? It is that practical considerations cling to it and stifle it; it subserves
30 interests not its own; our organs of criticism are organs of men and parties having practical ends to serve, and with them those practical ends are the first thing and the play of mind the second; so much play of mind as is compatible with the prosecution of those practical ends is all that is wanted. An organ like the Revue des Deux Mondes, having for its main function to understand and utter the best that is known and thought in the world, existing, it may be said, as just an organ for a free play of the mind, we have not; but we have the Edinburgh Review, existing as an organ of 40 the old Whigs, and for as much play of mind as may suit its being that; we have the Quarterly Review, existing as an organ of the Tories, and for as much play of mind as may suit its being that ; we have the British Quarterly Review, existing as an organ of the political Dissenters, and for as much play of mind as may suit its being that ; we have the Times, existing as an organ of the common, satisfied, well-to-do Englishman, and for as much play of mind as may suit its being that. And so on through all the various fractions, political and religious, of our society ; every fraction has, as such, its organ of criticism, but the notion of combining all fractions in the common pleasure of a free 10 disinterested play of mind meets with no favour. Directly this play of mind wants to have more scope, and to forget the pressure of practical considerations a little, it is checked, it is made to feel the chain ; we saw this the other day in the extinction, so much to be regretted, of the Home and Foreign Review ; perhaps in no organ of criticism in this country was there so much knowledge, so much play of mind ; but these could not save it : the Dublin Review subordinates play of mind to the practical business of English and Irish Catholicism, and lives. It must needs 20 be that men should act in sects and parties, that each of these sects and parties should have its organ, and should make this organ subserve the interests of its action ; but it would be well, too, that there should be a criticism, not the minister of these interests, not their enemy, but absolutely and entirely independent of them. No other criticism will ever attain any real authority or make any real way towards its end,—the creating a current of true and fresh ideas.

It is because criticism has so little kept in the pure intel- 30 lectual sphere, has so little detached itself from practice, has been so directly polemical and controversial, that it has so ill accomplished, in this country, its best spiritual work ; which is to keep man from a self-satisfaction which is retarding and vulgarising, to lead him towards perfection, by making his mind dwell upon what is excellent in itself, and the absolute beauty and fitness of things. A polemical practical criticism makes men blind even to the ideal imperfection of their practice, makes them willingly assert its ideal perfection, in order the better to secure it against 40 attack ; and clearly this is narrowing and baneful for them.

If they were reassured on the practical side, speculative considerations of ideal perfection they might be brought to entertain, and their spiritual horizon would thus gradually widen. Mr. Adderley says to the Warwickshire farmers :—

‘ Talk of the improvement of breed ! Why, the race we ourselves represent, the men and women, the old Anglo-Saxon race, are the best breed in the whole world. . . . The absence of a too enervating climate, too unclouded skies, and a too luxurious nature, has produced so vigorous a race of 10 people, and has rendered us so superior to all the world.’

Mr. Roebuck says to the Sheffield cutlers :—

‘ I look around me and ask what is the state of England ? Is not property safe ? Is not every man able to say what he likes ? Can you not walk from one end of England to the other in perfect security ? I ask you whether, the world over or in past history, there is anything like it ? Nothing. I pray that our unrivalled happiness may last.’

Now obviously there is a peril for poor human nature in words and thoughts of such exuberant self-satisfaction, 20 until we find ourselves safe in the streets of the Celestial City.

‘ Das wenige verschwindet leicht dem Blicke
Der vorwärts sieht, wie viel noch übrig bleibt—’

says Goethe ; the little that is done seems nothing when we look forward and see how much we have yet to do. Clearly this is a better line of reflection for weak humanity, so long as it remains on this earthly field of labour and trial. But neither Mr. Adderley nor Mr. Roebuck is by nature inaccessible to considerations of this sort. They only lose sight 30 of them owing to the controversial life we all lead, and the practical form which all speculation takes with us. They have in view opponents whose aim is not ideal, but practical ; and in their zeal to uphold their own practice against these innovators, they go so far as even to attribute to this practice an ideal perfection. Somebody has been wanting to introduce a six-pound franchise, or to abolish church-rates, or to collect agricultural statistics by force, or to diminish local self-government. How natural, in reply to such proposals, very likely improper or ill-timed, to go a
40 little beyond the mark, and to say stoutly, ‘ Such a race

of people as we stand, so superior to all the world! The old Anglo-Saxon race, the best breed in the whole world! I pray that our unrivalled happiness may last! I ask you whether, the world over or in past history, there is anything like it!' And so long as criticism answers this dithyramb by insisting that the old Anglo-Saxon race would be still more superior to all others if it had no church-rates, or that our unrivalled happiness would last yet longer with a six-pound franchise, so long will the strain, 'The best breed in the whole world!' swell louder and louder, everything ideal 10 and refining will be lost out of sight, and both the assailed and their critics will remain in a sphere, to say the truth, perfectly unvital, a sphere in which spiritual progression is impossible. But let criticism leave church-rates and the franchise alone, and in the most candid spirit, without a single lurking thought of practical innovation, confront with our dithyramb this paragraph on which I stumbled in a newspaper soon after reading Mr. Roebuck:—

'A shocking child murder has just been committed at Nottingham. A girl named Wragg left the workhouse there 20 on Saturday morning with her young illegitimate child. The child was soon afterwards found dead on Mapperly Hills, having been strangled. Wragg is in custody.'

Nothing but that; but, in juxtaposition with the absolute eulogies of Mr. Adderley and Mr. Roebuck, how eloquent, how suggestive are those few lines! 'Our old Anglo-Saxon breed, the best in the whole world!'—how much that is harsh and ill-favoured there is in this best! Wragg! If we are to talk of ideal perfection, of 'the best in the whole world,' has any one reflected what a touch of grossness in 30 our race, what an original shortcoming in the more delicate spiritual perceptions, is shown by the natural growth amongst us of such hideous names,—Higginbottom, Stiggins, Bugg! In Ionia and Attica they were luckier in this respect than 'the best race in the world;' by the Ilissus there was no Wragg, poor thing! And 'our unrivalled happiness;'—what an element of grimness, bareness, and hideousness mixes with it and blurs it; the workhouse, the dismal Mapperly Hills,—how dismal those who have seen them will remember;—the gloom, the smoke, 40 the cold, the strangled illegitimate child! 'I ask you whether, the world over or in past history, there is anything like it ?' Perhaps not, one is inclined to answer ; but at any rate, in that case, the world is very much to be pitied. And the final touch,—short, bleak, and inhuman : Wragg is in custody. The sex lost in the confusion of our unrivalled happiness ; or (shall I say ?) the superfluous Christian name lopped off by the straightforward vigour of our old Anglo-Saxon breed ! There is profit for the spirit in such contrasts as this ; criticism serves the cause of perfection by estab-

10 lishing them. By eluding sterile conflict, by refusing to remain in the sphere where alone narrow and relative conceptions have any worth and validity, criticism may diminish its momentary importance, but only in this way has it a chance of gaining admittance for those wider and more perfect conceptions to which all its duty is really owed. Mr. Roebuck will have a poor opinion of an adversary who replies to his defiant songs of triumph only by murmuring under his breath, Wragg is in custody ; but in no other way will these songs of triumph be induced gradually to moder-
20 ate themselves, to get rid of what in them is excessive and offensive, and to fall into a softer and truer key.

It will be said that it is a very subtle and indirect action which I am thus prescribing for criticism, and that by embracing in this manner the Indian virtue of detachment and abandoning the sphere of practical life, it condemns itself to a slow and obscure work. Slow and obscure it may be, but it is the only proper work of criticism. The mass of mankind will never have any ardent zeal for seeing things as they are ; very inadequate ideas will always satisfy them.
30 On these inadequate ideas reposes, and must repose, the general practice of the world. That is as much as saying that whoever sets himself to see things as they are will find himself one of a very small circle ; but it is only by this small circle resolutely doing its own work that adequate ideas will ever get current at all. The rush and roar of practical life will always have a dizzying and attracting effect upon the most collected spectator, and tend to draw him into its vortex ; most of all will this be the case where that life is so powerful as it is in England. But it is only by practical man any service ; and it is only by the greatest sincerity in pursuing his own course, and by at last convincing even the practical man of his sincerity, that he can escape misunderstandings which perpetually threaten him.
40 remaining collected, and refusing to lend himself to the point of view of the practical man, that the critic can do the

For the practical man is not apt for fine distinctions, and yet in these distinctions truth and the highest culture greatly find their account. But it is not easy to lead a practical man—unless you reassure him as to your practical intentions, you have no chance of leading him—to see that a thing which he has always been used to look at from one <sup>10</sup> side only, which he greatly values, and which, looked at from that side, more than deserves, perhaps, all the prizing and admiring which he bestows upon it,—that this thing, looked at from another side, may appear much less beneficent and beautiful, and yet retain all its claims to our practical allegiance. Where shall we find language innocent enough, how shall we make the spotless purity of our intentions evident enough, to enable us to say to the political Englishman that the British Constitution itself, which, seen from the practical side, looks such a magnificent <sup>20</sup> organ of progress and virtue, seen from the speculative side, —with its compromises, its love of facts, its horror of theory, its studied avoidance of clear thoughts,—that, seen from this side, our august Constitution sometimes looks, —forgive me, shade of Lord Somers !—a colossal machine for the manufacture of Philistines ? How is Cobbett to say this and not be misunderstood, blackened as he is with the smoke of a lifelong conflict in the field of political practice ? how is Mr. Carlyle to say it and not be misunderstood, after his furious raid into this field with his Latter-day Pamphlets ? <sup>30</sup> how is Mr. Ruskin, after his pugnacious political economy ? I say, the critic must keep out of the region of immediate practice in the political, social, humanitarian sphere, if he wants to make a beginning for that more free speculative treatment of things, which may perhaps one day make its benefits felt even in this sphere, but in a natural and thence irresistible manner.

Do what he will, however, the critic will still remain exposed to frequent misunderstandings, and nowhere so much as in this country. For here people are particularly <sup>40</sup> indisposed even to comprehend that without this free disinterested treatment of things, truth and the highest culture are out of the question. So immersed are they in practical life, so accustomed to take all their notions from this life and its processes, that they are apt to think that truth and culture themselves can be reached by the processes of this life, and that it is an impertinent singularity to think of reaching them in any other. 'We are all terrae filii,' cries their eloquent advocate; 'all Philistines together. Away with the notion of proceeding by any other 10 course than the course dear to the Philistines; let us have a social movement, let us organize and combine a party to pursue truth and new thought, let us call it the liberal party, and let us all stick to each other, and back each other up. Let us have no nonsense about independent criticism, and intellectual delicacy, and the few and the many; don't let us trouble ourselves about foreign thought; we shall invent the whole thing for ourselves as we go along: if one of us speaks well, applaud him; if one of us speaks ill, applaud him too; we are all in the same movement, we are 20 all liberals, we are all in pursuit of truth.' In this way the pursuit of truth becomes really a social, practical, pleasurable affair, almost requiring a chairman, a secretary, and advertisements; with the excitement of an occasional scandal, with a little resistance to give the happy sense of difficulty overcome; but, in general, plenty of bustle and very little thought. To act is so easy, as Goethe says; to think is so hard! It is true that the critic has many temptations to go with the stream, to make one of the party of movement, one of these terrae filii; it seems ungracious to 30 refuse to be a terrae filius, when so many excellent people are; but the critic's duty is to refuse, or, if resistance is vain, at least to cry with Obermann: Périssons en résistant.

How serious a matter it is to try and resist, I had ample opportunity of experiencing when I ventured some time ago to criticise the celebrated first volume of Bishop Colenso.<sup>1</sup> The echoes of the storm which was then raised <sup>1</sup> So sincere is my dislike to all personal attack and controversy, that I abstain from reprinting, at this distance of time from the occasion which called them forth, the essays in which I criticised Dr. Colenso's book; I feel bound, however, after all that has passed, to make here a final declaration of my sincere impenitence for having published them.

I still, from time to time, hear grumbling round me. That storm arose out of a misunderstanding almost inevitable. It is a result of no little culture to attain to a clear perception that science and religion are two wholly different things; the multitude will for ever confuse them, but happily that is of no great real importance, for while the multitude imagines itself to live by its false science, it does really live by its true religion. Dr. Colenso, however, in his first volume did all he could to strengthen the confusion,<sup>1</sup> and to make it dangerous. He did this with the best intentions,<sup>10</sup> I freely admit, and with the most candid ignorance that this was the natural effect of what he was doing; but, says Joubert, 'Ignorance, which in matters of morals extenuates the crime, is itself, in intellectual matters, a crime of the first order.' I criticised Bishop Colenso's speculative confusion. Immediately there was a cry raised: 'What is this? here is a liberal attacking a liberal. Do not you belong to the movement? are not you a friend of truth? Is not Bishop Colenso in pursuit of truth? then speak with proper respect of his book. Dr. Stanley is another friend<sup>20</sup> of truth, and you speak with proper respect of his book; why make these invidious differences? both books are excellent, admirable, liberal; Bishop Colenso's perhaps the most so, because it is the boldest, and will have the best practical consequences for the liberal cause. Do you want to encourage to the attack of a brother liberal his, and your, and our implacable enemies, the Church and State Review or the Record,—the High Church rhinoceros and the Evangelical hyaena? Be silent, therefore; or rather speak, speak as loud as ever you can, and go into ecstasies over the eighty<sup>30</sup> and odd pigeons.'

But criticism cannot follow this coarse and indiscriminate method. It is unfortunately possible for a man in pursuit

Nay, I cannot forbear repeating yet once more, for his benefit and that of his readers, this sentence from my original remarks upon him: There is truth of science and truth of religion; truth of science does not become truth of religion till it is made religious. And I will add: Let us have all the science there is from the men of science; from the men of religion let us have religion.

<sup>1</sup> It has been said I make it 'a crime against literary criticism and the higher culture to attempt to inform the ignorant.' Need I point out that the ignorant are not informed by being confirmed in a confusion?

of truth to write a book which reposes upon a false conception. Even the practical consequences of a book are to genuine criticism no recommendation of it, if the book is, in the highest sense, blundering. I see that a lady who herself, too, is in pursuit of truth, and who writes with great ability, but a little too much, perhaps, under the influence of the practical spirit of the English liberal movement, classes Bishop Colenso's book and M. Renan's together, in her survey of the religious state of Europe, as facts of the 10 same order, works, both of them, of 'great importance ;' 'great ability, power, and skill ;' Bishop Colenso's, perhaps, the most powerful ; at least, Miss Cobbe gives special expression to her gratitude that to Bishop Colenso 'has been given the strength to grasp, and the courage to teach, truths of such deep import.' In the same way, more than one popular writer has compared him to Luther. Now it is just this kind of false estimate which the critical spirit is, it seems to me, bound to resist. It is really the strongest possible proof of the low ebb at which, in England, the 20 critical spirit is, that while the critical hit in the religious literature of Germany is Dr. Strauss's book, in that of France M. Renan's book, the book of Bishop Colenso is the critical hit in the religious literature of England. Bishop Colenso's book reposes on a total misconception of the essential elements of the religious problem, as that problem is now presented for solution. To criticism, therefore, which seeks to have the best that is known and thought on this problem, it is, however well meant, of no importance whatever. M. Renan's book attempts a new synthesis of 30 the elements furnished to us by the Four Gospels. It attempts, in my opinion, a synthesis, perhaps premature, perhaps impossible, certainly not successful. Up to the present time, at any rate, we must acquiesce in Fleury's sentence on such recastings of the Gospel-story : Quiconque s' imagine la pouvoir mieux écrire, ne l' entend pas. M. Renan had himself passed by anticipation a like sentence on his own work, when he said : 'If a new presentation of the character of Jesus were offered to me, I would not have it ; its very clearness would be, in my opinion, the best proof scene of the Gospel-story, all the current of M. Renan's thoughts may have naturally changed, and a new casting of that story irresistibly suggested itself to him ; and that this is just a case for applying Cicero's maxim : Change of mind is not inconsistency—nemo doctus unquam mutationem consilii inconstantiam dixit esse. Nevertheless, for criticism, M. Renan's first thought must still be the truer one, as long as his new casting so fails more fully to commend itself, more fully (to use Coleridge's happy phrase about the Bible) to find us. Still M. Renan's attempt is, for criticism, of the 10 most real interest and importance, since, with all its difficulty, a fresh synthesis of the New Testament data,—not a making war on them, in Voltaire's fashion, not a leaving them out of mind, in the world's fashion, but the putting a new construction upon them, the taking them from under the old, adoptive, traditional, unspiritual point of view and placing them under a new one,—is the very essence of the religious problem, as now presented ; and only by efforts in this direction can it receive a solution.
40 of its insufficiency.' His friends may with perfect justice rejoin that at the sight of the Holy Land, and of the actual

Again, in the same spirit in which she judges Bishop 20 Colenso, Miss Cobbe, like so many earnest liberals of our practical race, both here and in America, herself sets vigorously about a positive reconstruction of religion, about making a religion of the future out of hand, or at least setting about making it ; we must not rest, she and they are always thinking and saying, in negative criticism, we must be creative and constructive ; hence we have such works as her recent Religious Duty, and works still more considerable, perhaps, by others, which will be in every one's mind. These works often have much ability ; they 30 often spring out of sincere convictions, and a sincere wish to do good ; and they sometimes, perhaps, do good. Their fault is (if I may be permitted to say so) one which they have in common with the British College of Health, in the New Road. Every one knows the British College of Health ; it is that building with the lion and the statue of the Goddess Hygeia before it ; at least, I am sure about the lion, though I am not absolutely certain about the Goddess Hygeia. This building does credit, perhaps, to the resources of Dr. Morrison and his disciples ; but it falls a good deal 40 short of one's idea of what a British College of Health ought to be. In England, where we hate public interference and love individual enterprise, we have a whole crop of places like the British College of Health ; the grand name without the grand thing. Unluckily, creditable to individual enterprise as they are, they tend to impair our taste by making us forget what more grandiose, noble, or beautiful character properly belongs to a public institution. The same may be said of the religions of the future of Miss Cobbe and others. Creditable, like the British College of Health, to the 10 resources of their authors, they yet tend to make us forget what more grandiose, noble, or beautiful character properly belongs to religious constructions. The historic religions, with all their faults, have had this ; it certainly belongs to the religious sentiment, when it truly flowers, to have this ; and we impoverish our spirit if we allow a religion of the future without it. What then is the duty of criticism here ? To take the practical point of view, to applaud the liberal movement and all its works,—its New Road religions of the future into the bargain,—for their general utility's sake ?

 20 By no means ; but to be perpetually dissatisfied with these works, while they perpetually fall short of a high and perfect ideal.

For criticism, these are elementary laws ; but they never can be popular, and in this country they have been very little followed, and one meets with immense obstacles in following them. That is a reason for asserting them again and again. Criticism must maintain its independence of the practical spirit and its aims. Even with well-meant efforts of the practical spirit it must express dissatisfaction, 30 if in the sphere of the ideal they seem impoverishing and limiting. It must not hurry on to the goal because of its practical importance. It must be patient, and know how to wait ; and flexible, and know how to attach itself to things and how to withdraw from them. It must be apt to study and praise elements that for the fulness of spiritual perfection are wanted, even though they belong to a power which in the practical sphere may be maleficent. It must be apt to discern the spiritual shortcomings or illusions of powers that in the practical sphere may be beneficent. And playing off, in this sphere, one power against the other. When one looks, for instance, at the English Divorce Court,—an institution which perhaps has its practical conveniences, but which in the ideal sphere is so hideous; an institution which neither makes divorce impossible nor makes it decent, which allows a man to get rid of his wife, or a wife of her husband, but makes them drag one another first, for the public edification, through a mire of unutterable infamy,—when one looks at this charming institution, I say, with its crowded benches, its newspaper-reports, and its money-compensations, this institution in which the gross unregenerate British Philistine has indeed stamped an image of himself,—one may be permitted to find the marriage-theory of Catholicism refreshing and elevating. Or when Protestantism, in virtue of its supposed rational and intellectual origin, gives the law to criticism too magisterially, criticism may and must remind it that its pretensions, in this respect, are illusive and do it harm; that the Reformation was a moral rather than an intellectual event; that Luther's theory of grace no more exactly reflects the mind of the spirit than Bossuet's philosophy of history reflects it; and that there is no more antecedent probability of the Bishop of Durham's stock of ideas being agreeable to perfect reason than of Pope Pius the Ninth's. But criticism will not on that account forget the achievements of Protestantism in the practical and moral sphere; nor that, even in the intellectual sphere, Protestantism, though in a blind and stumbling manner, carried forward the Renaissance, while Catholicism threw itself violently across its path.
 40 this without any notion of favouring or injuring, in the practical sphere, one power or the other ; without any notion of

I lately heard a man of thought and energy contrasting the want of ardour and movement which he now found amongst young men in this country with what he remembered in his own youth, twenty years ago. 'What reformers we were then!' he exclaimed; 'what a zeal we had! how we canvassed every institution in Church and State, and were prepared to remodel them all on first principles!' He was inclined to regret, as a spiritual flagging, the lull which he saw. I am disposed rather to regard it as a pause in which the turn to a new mode of spiritual progress is being accomplished. Everything was long seen, by the young and ardent amongst us, in inseparable connection with politics and practical life ; we have pretty well exhausted the benefits of seeing things in this connection, we have got all that can be got by so seeing them. Let us try a more disinterested mode of seeing them ; let us betake ourselves more to the serener life of the mind and spirit. This life, too, may have its excesses and dangers ; but they are not for us at present. Let us think of quietly enlarging our stock of true and fresh ideas, and not, as soon as we get 10 an idea or half an idea, be running out with it into the street, and trying to make it rule there. Our ideas will, in the end, shape the world all the better for maturing a little. Perhaps in fifty years' time it will in the English House of Commons be an objection to an institution that it is an anomaly, and my friend the Member of Parliament will shudder in his grave. But let us in the meanwhile rather endeavour that in twenty years' time it may, in English literature, be an objection to a proposition that it is absurd. That will be a change so vast, that the imagination almost 20 fails to grasp it. Ab integro saeculorum nascitur ordo.

If I have insisted so much on the course which criticism must take where politics and religion are concerned, it is because, where these burning matters are in question, it is most likely to go astray. I have wished, above all, to insist on the attitude which criticism should adopt towards everything ; on its right tone and temper of mind. Then comes the question as to the subject-matter which criticism should most seek. Here, in general, its course is determined for it by the idea which is the law of its being ; the idea of 30 a disinterested endeavour to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world, and thus to establish a current of fresh and true ideas. By the very nature of things, as England is not all the world, much of the best that is known and thought in the world cannot be of English growth, must be foreign ; by the nature of things, again, it is just this that we are least likely to know, while English thought is streaming in upon us from all sides and takes excellent care that we shall not be ignorant of its existence ; the English critic, therefore, must dwell much 40 on foreign thought, and with particular heed on any part of it, which, while significant and fruitful in itself, is for any reason specially likely to escape him. Again, judging is often spoken of as the critic's one business ; and so in some sense it is ; but the judgment which almost insensibly forms itself in a fair and clear mind, along with fresh knowledge, is the valuable one ; and thus knowledge, and ever fresh knowledge, must be the critic's great concern for himself ; and it is by communicating fresh knowledge, and letting his own judgment pass along with it,—but insensibly, and in the second place not the first, as a sort of companion and clue, not as an abstract lawgiver,—that he will generally do 10 most good to his readers. Sometimes, no doubt, for the sake of establishing an author's place in literature, and his relation to a central standard (and if this is not done, how are we to get at our best in the world ?), criticism may have to deal with a subject-matter so familiar that fresh knowledge is out of the question, and then it must be all judgment ; an enunciation and detailed application of principles. Here the great safeguard is never to let oneself become abstract, always to retain an intimate and lively consciousness of the truth of what one is saying, and, the moment this fails us, 20 to be sure that something is wrong. Still, under all circumstances, this mere judgment and application of principles is, in itself, not the most satisfactory work to the critic ; like mathematics, it is tautological, and cannot well give us, like fresh learning, the sense of creative activity.

ARNOLD

D

But stop, some one will say ; all this talk is of no practical use to us whatever ; this criticism of yours is not what we have in our minds when we speak of criticism ; when we speak of critics and criticism, we mean critics and criticism of the current English literature of the day ; when you offer 30 to tell criticism its function, it is to this criticism that we expect you to address yourself. I am sorry for it, for I am afraid I must disappoint these expectations. I am bound by my own definition of criticism : a disinterested endeavour to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world. How much of current English literature comes into this 'best that is known and thought in the world' ? Not very much, I fear ; certainly less, at this moment, than of the current literature of France or Germany. Well, then, am I to alter my definition of criticism, in order to meet the 40 requirements of a number of practising English critics, who, after all, are free in their choice of a business ? That would be making criticism lend itself just to one of those alien practical considerations, which, I have said, are so fatal to it. One may say, indeed, to those who have to deal with the mass—so much better disregarded—of current English literature, that they may at all events endeavour, in dealing with this, to try it, so far as they can, by the standard of the best that is known and thought in the world ; one may say, that to get anywhere near this standard, every critic should 10 try and possess one great literature, at least, besides his own ; and the more unlike his own, the better. But, after all, the criticism I am really concerned with,—the criticism which alone can much help us for the future, the criticism which, throughout Europe, is at the present day meant, when so much stress is laid on the importance of criticism and the critical spirit,—is a criticism which regards Europe as being, for intellectual and spiritual purposes, one great confederation, bound to a joint action and working to a common result ; and whose members have, for their proper 20 outfit, a knowledge of Greek, Roman, and Eastern antiquity, and of one another. Special, local, and temporary advantages being put out of account, that modern nation will in the intellectual and spiritual sphere make most progress, which most thoroughly carries out this programme. And what is that but saying that we too, all of us, as individuals, the more thoroughly we carry it out, shall make the more progress ?

There is so much inviting us !—what are we to take ? what will nourish us in growth towards perfection ? That 30 is the question which, with the immense field of life and of literature lying before him, the critic has to answer ; for himself first, and afterwards for others. In this idea of the critic's business the essays brought together in the following pages have had their origin ; in this idea, widely different as are their subjects, they have, perhaps, their unity.

I conclude with what I said at the beginning : to have the sense of creative activity is the great happiness and the great proof of being alive, and it is not denied to criticism to have it ; but then criticism must be sincere, simple, 40 flexible, ardent, ever widening its knowledge. Then it may have, in no contemptible measure, a joyful sense of creative activity ; a sense which a man of insight and conscience will prefer to what he might derive from a poor, starved, fragmentary, inadequate creation. And at some epochs no other creation is possible.

Still, in full measure, the sense of creative activity belongs only to genuine creation ; in literature we must never forget that. But what true man of letters ever can forget it ? It is no such common matter for a gifted nature to come into possession of a current of true and living ideas, and to produce amidst the inspiration of them, that we are <sup>10</sup> likely to underrate it. The epochs of Aeschylus and Shakespeare make us feel their pre-eminence. In an epoch like those is, no doubt, the true life of a literature ; there is the promised land, towards which criticism can only beckon. That promised land it will not be ours to enter, and we shall die in the wilderness : but to have desired to enter it, to have saluted it from afar, is already, perhaps, the best distinction among contemporaries ; it will certainly be the best title to esteem with posterity.

THE LITERARY INFLUENCE OF ACADEMIES

It is impossible to put down a book like the history of the French Academy, by Pellisson and D'Olivet, which M. Charles Livet has lately re-edited, without being led to reflect upon the absence, in our own country, of any institution like the French Academy, upon the probable causes of this absence, and upon its results. A thousand voices will be ready to tell us that this absence is a signal mark of our national superiority; that it is in great part owing to this absence that the exhilarating words of Lord Macaulay, 10 lately given to the world by his very clever nephew, Mr. Trevelyan, are so profoundly true: 'It may safely be said that the literature now extant in the English language is of far greater value than all the literature which three hundred years ago was extant in all the languages of the world together.' I daresay this is so; only, remembering Spinoza's maxim that the two great banes of humanity are self-conceit and the laziness coming from self-conceit, I think it may do us good, instead of resting in our pre-eminence with perfect security, to look a little more closely why this is so, 20 and whether it is so without any limitations.

But first of all I must give a very few words to the outward history of the French Academy. About the year 1629, seven or eight persons in Paris, fond of literature, formed themselves into a sort of little club to meet at one another's houses and discuss literary matters. Their meetings got talked of, and Cardinal Richelieu, then minister and all powerful, heard of them. He himself had a noble passion for letters, and for all fine culture; he was interested by what he heard of the nascent society. Himself a man in 30 the grand style, if ever man was, he had the insight to perceive what a potent instrument of the grand style was here to his hand. It was the beginning of a great century for France, the seventeenth ; men's minds were working, the French language was forming. Richelieu sent to ask the members of the new society whether they would be willing to become a body with a public character, holding regular meetings. Not without a little hesitation,—for apparently they found themselves very well as they were, and these seven or eight gentlemen of a social and literary turn were not perfectly at their ease as to what the great and terrible minister could want with them,—they consented. The favours of a man like Richelieu are not easily 10 refused, whether they are honestly meant or no ; but this favour of Richelieu's was meant quite honestly. The Parliament, however, had its doubts of this. The Parliament had none of Richelieu's enthusiasm about letters and culture ; it was jealous of the apparition of a new public body in the State ; above all, of a body called into existence by Richelieu. The King's letters patent, establishing and authorizing the new society, were granted early in 1635 ; but, by the old constitution of France, these letters patent required the verification of the Parliament. It was two 20 years and a half,—towards the autumn of 1637,—before the Parliament would give it ; and it then gave it only after pressing solicitations, and earnest assurances of the innocent intentions of the young Academy. Jocose people said that this society, with its mission to purify and embellish the language, filled with terror a body of lawyers like the French Parliament, the stronghold of barbarous jargon and of chicane.

This improvement of the language was in truth the declared grand aim for the operations of the Academy. Its 30 statutes of foundation, approved by Richelieu before the royal edict establishing it was issued, say expressly : ' The Academy's principal function shall be to work with all the care and all the diligence possible at giving sure rules to our language, and rendering it pure, eloquent, and capable of treating the arts and sciences.' This zeal for making a nation's great instrument of thought,—its language,—correct and worthy, is undoubtedly a sign full of promise, a weighty earnest of future power. It is said that Richelieu had it in his mind that French should succeed Latin in its 40 general ascendancy, as Latin had succeeded Greek ; if it was so, even this wish has to some extent been fulfilled. But, at any rate, the ethical influences of style in language,—its close relations, so often pointed out, with character,—are most important. Richelieu, a man of high culture, and, at the same time, of great character, felt them profoundly; and that he should have sought to regularise, strengthen, and perpetuate them by an institution for perfecting language, is alone a striking proof of his governing spirit and of his genius.

10 This was not all he had in his mind, however. The new Academy, now enlarged to a body of forty members, and meant to contain all the chief literary men of France, was to be a literary tribunal. The works of its members were to be brought before it previous to publication, were to be criticised by it, and finally, if it saw fit, to be published with its declared approbation. The works of other writers, not members of the Academy, might also, at the request of these writers themselves, be passed under the Academy's review. Besides this, in essays and discussions the Aca-
20 demy examined and judged works already published, whether by living or dead authors, and literary matters in general. The celebrated opinion on Corneille's Cid, delivered in 1637 by the Academy at Richelieu's urgent request, when this poem, which strongly occupied public attention, had been attacked by M. de Scudéry, shows how fully Richelieu designed his new creation to do duty as a supreme court of literature, and how early it in fact began to exercise this function. One <sup>1</sup> who had known Richelieu declared, after the Cardinal's death, that he had projected
30 a yet greater institution than the Academy, a sort of grand European college of art, science, and literature, a Prytaneum, where the chief authors of all Europe should be gathered together in one central home, there to live in security, leisure, and honour;—that was a dream which will not bear to be pulled about too roughly. But the project of forming a high court of letters for France was no dream; Richelieu in great measure fulfilled it. This is what the Academy, by its idea, really is; this is what it has always tended to become; this is what it to be this, far more than even by what it has done for the language, it is of such importance in France. To give the law, the tone to literature, and that tone a high one, is its business. 'Richelieu meant it,' says M. Sainte-Beuve, 'to be a haut jury,'—a jury the most choice and authoritative that could be found on all important literary matters in question before the public; to be, as it in fact became in the latter half of the eighteenth century, 'a sovereign organ of opinion.' 'The duty of the Academy is,' says M. Renan, 'maintenir la délicatesse de l'esprit français'—to keep the fine quality of the French spirit unimpaired; it represents a kind of 'maîtrise en fait de bon ton'—the authority of a recognized master in matters of tone and taste. 'All ages,' says M. Renan again, 'have had their inferior literature; but the great danger of our time is that this inferior literature tends more and more to get the upper place. No one has the same advantage as the Academy for fighting against this mischief;' the Academy, which, as he says elsewhere, has even special facilities for 'creating a form of intellectual culture which shall impose itself on all around.' M. Sainte-Beuve and M. Renan are, both of them, very keen-sighted critics; and they show it signally by seizing and putting so prominently forward this character of the French Academy.
40 has, from time to time, really been; by being, or tending

<sup>1</sup> La Mesnardière.

Such an effort to set up a recognised authority, imposing on us a high standard in matters of intellect and taste, has many enemies in human nature. We all of us like to go our own way, and not to be forced out of the atmosphere of commonplace habitual to most of us;—'was uns alle bändigt,' says Goethe, 'das Gemeine.' We like to be suffered to lie comfortably in the old straw of our habits, especially of our intellectual habits, even though this straw may not be very clean and fine. But if the effort to limit this freedom of our lower nature finds, as it does and must find, enemies in human nature, it finds also auxiliaries in it. Out of the four great parts, says Cicero, of the honestum, or good, which forms the matter on which officium, or human duty, finds employment, one is the fixing of a modus and an ordo, a measure and an order, to fashion and wholesomely constrain our action, in order to lift it above the level it keeps if left to itself, and to bring it nearer to perfection. Man alone of living creatures, he says, goes feeling after 'quid sit ordo, quid sit quod deceat, in factis dictisque qui modus'—the discovery of an order, a law of good taste, a measure for his words and actions. Other creatures submissively follow the law of their nature; man alone has an impulse leading him to set up some other law to control the bent of his nature.

This holds good, of course, as to moral matters, as well
 10 as intellectual matters: and it is of moral matters that we are generally thinking when we affirm it. But it holds good as to intellectual matters too. Now, probably, M. Sainte-Beuve had not these words of Cicero in his mind when he made, about the French nation, the assertion I am going to quote; but, for all that, the assertion leans for support, one may say, upon the truth conveyed in those words of Cicero, and wonderfully illustrates and confirms them. 'In France,' says M. Sainte-Beuve, 'the first 20 consideration for us is not whether we are amused and pleased by a work of art or mind, nor is it whether we are touched by it. What we seek above all to learn is, whether we were right in being amused with it, and in applauding it, and in being moved by it.' Those are very remarkable words, and they are, I believe, in the main quite true. A Frenchman has, to a considerable degree, what one may call a conscience in intellectual matters; he has an active belief that there is a right and a wrong in them, that he is bound to honour and obey the right, that he is disgraced by cleaving to the wrong. All the world has, or professes
 30 to have, this conscience in moral matters. The word conscience has become almost confined, in popular use, to the moral sphere, because this lively susceptibility of feeling is, in the moral sphere, so far more common than in the intellectual sphere; the livelier, in the moral sphere, this susceptibility is, the greater becomes a man's readiness to admit a high standard of action, an ideal authoritatively correcting his everyday moral habits; here, such willing admission of authority is due to sensitiveness of conscience. And a like deference to a standard higher than one's own 40 habitual standard in intellectual matters, a like respectful recognition of a superior ideal, is caused, in the intellectual sphere, by sensitiveness of intelligence. Those whose intelligence is quickest, openest, most sensitive, are readiest with this deference ; those whose intelligence is less delicate and sensitive are less disposed to it. Well, now we are on the road to see why the French have their Academy and we have nothing of the kind.

What are the essential characteristics of the spirit of our nation ? Not, certainly, an open and clear mind, not a quick and flexible intelligence. Our greatest admirers would not claim for us that we have these in a pre-eminent <sup>10</sup> degree ; they might say that we had more of them than our detractors gave us credit for ; but they would not assert them to be our essential characteristics. They would rather allege, as our chief spiritual characteristics, energy and honesty ; and, if we are judged favourably and positively, not invidiously and negatively, our chief characteristics are, no doubt, these ;—energy and honesty, not an open and clear mind, not a quick and flexible intelligence. Openness of mind and flexibility of intelligence were very signal characteristics of the Athenian people in ancient times ; <sup>20</sup> everybody will feel that. Openness of mind and flexibility of intelligence are remarkable characteristics of the French people in modern times ; at any rate, they strikingly characterise them as compared with us ; I think everybody, or almost everybody, will feel that. I will not now ask what more the Athenian or the French spirit has than this, nor what shortcomings either of them may have as a set-off against this ; all I want now to point out is that they have this, and that we have it in a much lesser degree.

Let me remark, however, that not only in the moral <sup>30</sup> sphere, but also in the intellectual and spiritual sphere, energy and honesty are most important and fruitful qualities ; that, for instance, of what we call genius, energy is the most essential part. So, by assigning to a nation energy and honesty as its chief spiritual characteristics,—by refusing to it, as at all eminent characteristics, openness of mind and flexibility of intelligence,—we do not by any means, as some people might at first suppose, relegate its importance and its power of manifesting itself with effect from the intellectual to the moral sphere. <sup>40</sup> We only indicate its probable special line of successful activity in the intellectual sphere, and, it is true, certain imperfections and failings to which, in this sphere, it will always be subject. Genius is mainly an affair of energy, and poetry is mainly an affair of genius ; therefore, a nation whose spirit is characterised by energy may well be eminent in poetry ;—and we have Shakspeare. Again, the highest reach of science is, one may say, an inventive power, a faculty of divination, akin to the highest power exercised in poetry ; therefore, a nation whose spirit is characterised

10 by energy may well be eminent in science ;—and we have Newton. Shakspeare and Newton : in the intellectual sphere there can be no higher names. And what that energy, which is the life of genius, above everything demands and insists upon, is freedom ; entire independence of all authority, prescription, and routine,—the fullest room to expand as it will. Therefore, a nation whose chief spiritual characteristic is energy, will not be very apt to set up, in intellectual matters, a fixed standard, an authority, like an academy. By this it certainly escapes certain real incon-

20 veniences and dangers, and it can, at the same time, as we have seen, reach undeniably splendid heights in poetry and science. On the other hand, some of the requisites of intellectual work are specially the affair of quickness of mind and flexibility of intelligence. The form, the method of evolution, the precision, the proportions, the relations of the parts to the whole, in an intellectual work, depend mainly upon them. And these are the elements of an intellectual work which are really most communicable from it, which can most be learned and adopted from it,

30 which have, therefore, the greatest effect upon the intellectual performance of others. Even in poetry, these requisites are very important ; and the poetry of a nation, not eminent for the gifts on which they depend, will, more or less, suffer by this shortcoming. In poetry, however, they are, after all, secondary, and energy is the first thing ; but in prose they are of first-rate importance. In its prose literature, therefore, and in the routine of intellectual work generally, a nation with no particular gifts for these will not be so successful. These are what, consecrate and maintain them, and, therefore, a nation with an eminent turn for them naturally establishes academies. So far as routine and authority tend to embarrass energy and inventive genius, academies may be said to be obstructive to energy and inventive genius, and, to this extent, to the human spirit's general advance. But then this evil is so much compensated by the propagation, on a large scale, of the mental aptitudes and demands which an open mind and a flexible intelligence naturally engender, genius itself, in the long run, so greatly finds 10 its account in this propagation, and bodies like the French Academy have such power for promoting it, that the general advance of the human spirit is perhaps, on the whole, rather furthered than impeded by their existence.

40 I have said, can to a certain degree be learned and appropriated, while the free activity of genius cannot. Academies

How much greater is our nation in poetry than prose ! how much better, in general, do the productions of its spirit show in the qualities of genius than in the qualities of intelligence ! One may constantly remark this in the work of individuals ; how much more striking, in general, does any Englishman,—of some vigour of mind, but by 20 no means a poet,—seem in his verse than in his prose ! No doubt his verse suffers from the same defects which impair his prose, and he cannot express himself with real success in it ; but how much more powerful a personage does he appear in it, by dint of feeling, and of originality and movement of ideas, than when he is writing prose ! With a Frenchman of like stamp, it is just the reverse : set him to write poetry, he is limited, artificial, and impotent ; set him to write prose, he is free, natural, and effective. The power of French literature is in its 30 prose-writers, the power of English literature is in its poets. Nay, many of the celebrated French poets depend wholly for their fame upon the qualities of intelligence which they exhibit,—qualities which are the distinctive support of prose ; many of the celebrated English prose-writers depend wholly for their fame upon the qualities of genius and imagination which they exhibit,—qualities which are the distinctive support of poetry. But, as I have said, the qualities of genius are less transferable than the qualities of intelligence ; less can be immediately learned and 40 appropriated from their product ; they are less direct and stringent intellectual agencies, though they may be more beautiful and divine. Shakspeare and our great Elizabethan group were certainly more gifted writers than Corneille and his group; but what was the sequel to this great literature, this literature of genius, as we may call it, stretching from Marlow to Milton? What did it lead up to in English literature? To our provincial and second-rate literature of the eighteenth century. What, on the other hand, was the sequel to the literature of the French 'great century,' to this literature of intelligence, as, by comparison with our Elizabethan literature, we may call it; what did it lead up to? To the French literature of the eighteenth century, one of the most powerful and pervasive intellectual agencies that have ever existed, the greatest European force of the eighteenth century. In science, again, we had Newton, a genius of the very highest order, a type of genius in science, if ever there was one. On the continent, as a sort of counterpart to Newton, there was Leibnitz; a man, it seems to me (though on these matters I speak under correction), of much less creative energy of genius, much less power of divination than Newton, but rather a man of admirable intelligence, a type of intelligence in science, if ever there was one. Well, and what did they each directly lead up to in science? What was the intellectual generation that sprang from each of them? I only repeat what the men of science have themselves pointed out. The man of genius was continued by the English analysts of the eighteenth century, comparatively powerless and obscure followers of the renowned master; the man of intelligence was continued by successors like Bernouilli, Euler, Lagrange, and Laplace, the greatest names in modern mathematics.

What I want the reader to see is, that the question as to the utility of academies to the intellectual life of a nation is not settled when we say, for instance: 'Oh, we have never had an academy, and yet we have, confessedly, a very great literature.' It still remains to be asked: 'What sort of a great literature? a literature great in the special qualities of genius, or great in the special qualities of intelligence?' If in the former, it is by no means sure that either our literature, or the general intellectual life of our nation, has got already, without academies, all that academies can give. Both the one and the other may very well be somewhat wanting in those qualities of intelligence, out of a lively sense for which a body like the French Academy, as I have said, springs, and which such a body does a great deal to spread and confirm. Our literature, in spite of the genius manifested in it, may fall short in form, method, precision, proportions, arrangement,—all of them, I have said, things where intelligence proper comes in. It may be comparatively 10 weak in prose, that branch of literature where intelligence proper is, so to speak, all in all. In this branch it may show many grave faults to which the want of a quick, flexible intelligence, and of the strict standard which such an intelligence tends to impose, makes it liable; it may be full of hap-hazard, crudeness, provincialism, eccentricity, violence, blundering. It may be a less stringent and effective intellectual agency, both upon our own nation and upon the world at large, than other literatures which show less genius, perhaps, but more intelligence.

20

The right conclusion certainly is that we should try, so far as we can, to make up our shortcomings; and that to this end, instead of always fixing our thoughts upon the points in which our literature, and our intellectual life generally, are strong, we should, from time to time, fix them upon those in which they are weak, and so learn to perceive clearly what we have to amend. What is our second great spiritual characteristic,—our honesty,—good for, if it is not good for this? But it will,—I am sure it will,—more and more, as time goes on, be found good for 30 this.

Well, then, an institution like the French Academy,—an institution owing its existence to a national bent towards the things of the mind, towards culture, towards clearness, correctness, and propriety in thinking and speaking, and, in its turn, promoting this bent,—sets standards in a number of directions, and creates, in all these directions, a force of educated opinion, checking and rebuking those who fall below these standards, or who set them at nought. Educated opinion exists here as in 40 France; but in France the Academy serves as a sort of centre and rallying-point to it, and gives it a force which it has not got here. Why is all the journeyman-work of literature, as I may call it, so much worse done here than it is in France? I do not wish to hurt any one's feelings; but surely this is so. Think of the difference between our books of reference and those of the French, between our biographical dictionaries (to take a striking instance) and theirs; think of the difference between the translations of the classics turned out for Mr. Bohn's library and those 10 turned out for M. Nisard's collection! As a general rule, hardly any one amongst us, who knows French and German well, would use an English book of reference when he could get a French or German one; or would look at an English prose translation of an ancient author when he could get a French or German one. It is not that there do not exist in England, as in France, a number of people perfectly well able to discern what is good, in these things, from what is bad, and preferring what is good; but they are isolated, they form no powerful body of opinion, they 20 are not strong enough to set a standard, up to which even the journeyman-work of literature must be brought, if it is to be vendible. Ignorance and charlatanism in work of this kind are always trying to pass off their wares as excellent, and to cry down criticism as the voice of an insignificant, over-fastidious minority; they easily persuade the multitude that this is so when the minority is scattered about as it is here; not so easily when it is banded together as in the French Academy. So, again, with freaks in dealing with language; certainly all such freaks tend to impair

 30 the power and beauty of language; and how far more common they are with us than with the French! To take a very familiar instance. Every one has noticed the way in which the Times chooses to spell the word 'diocese'; it always spells it diocess,<sup>1</sup> deriving it, I suppose, from Zeus and census. The Journal des Débats might just as well write 'diocess' instead of 'diocèse,' but imagine the Journal des Débats doing so! Imagine an educated Frenchman indulging himself in an orthographical antic of this sort, in face of the grave respect with which the Academy and its dictionary invest the French language! Some people will say these are little things; they are not; they are of bad example. They tend to spread the baneful notion that there is no such thing as a high, correct standard in intellectual matters; that every one may as well take his own way; they are at variance with the severe discipline necessary for all real culture; they confirm us in habits of wilfulness and eccentricity, which hurt our minds, and damage our credit with serious people. The late Mr. Donaldson was 10 certainly a man of great ability, and I, who am not an Orientalist, do not pretend to judge his Jashar; but let the reader observe the form which a foreign Orientalist's judgment of it naturally takes. M. Renan calls it a tentative malheureuse, a failure, in short; this it may be, or it may not be; I am no judge. But he goes on: 'It is astonishing that a recent article' (in a French periodical, he means) 'should have brought forward as the last word of German exegesis a work like this, composed by a doctor of the University of Cambridge, and universally condemned by 20 German critics.' You see what he means to imply: an extravagance of this sort could never have come from Germany, where there is a great force of critical opinion controlling a learned man's vagaries, and keeping him straight; it comes from the native home of intellectual eccentricity of all kinds,<sup>1</sup>—from England, from a doctor of the University of Cambridge;—and I daresay he would not expect much better things from a doctor of the University of Oxford. Again, after speaking of what Germany and France have done for the history of Mahomet: 30 'America and England,' M. Renan goes on, 'have also occupied themselves with Mahomet.' He mentions Washington Irving's Life of Mahomet, which does not, he says, evince much of an historical sense, a sentiment historique fort élevé; 'but,' he proceeds, 'this book shows a real progress, when one thinks that in 1829 Mr. Charles Forster published two thick volumes, which enchanted

<sup>1</sup> The Times has now (1868) abandoned this spelling and adopted the ordinary one.

<sup>1</sup> A critic declares I am wrong in saying that M. Renan's language implies this. I still think that there is a shade, a nuance of expression, in M. Renan's language, which does imply this; but, I confess, the only person who can really settle such a question is M. Renan himself.

the English reverends, to make out that Mahomet was the little horn of the he-goat that figures in the eighth chapter of Daniel, and that the Pope was the great horn. Mr. Forster founded on this ingenious parallel a whole philosophy of history, according to which the Pope represented the Western corruption of Christianity, and Mahomet the Eastern; thence the striking resemblances between Mahometanism and Popery.' And in a note M. Renan adds: 'This is the same Mr. Charles Forster who is the 10 author of a mystification about the Sinaitic inscriptions, in which he declares he finds the primitive language.' As much as to say: 'It is an Englishman, be surprised at no extravagance.' If these innuendoes had no ground, and were made in hatred and malice, they would not be worth a moment's attention; but they come from a grave Orientalist, on his own subject, and they point to a real fact;—the absence, in this country, of any force of educated literary and scientific opinion, making aberrations like those of the author of The One Primeval Language out of the 20 question. Not only the author of such aberrations, often a very clever man, suffers by the want of check, by the not being kept straight, and spends force in vain on a false road, which, under better discipline, he might have used with profit on a true one; but all his adherents, both 'reverends' and others, suffer too, and the general rate of information and judgment is in this way kept low.

In a production which we have all been reading lately, a production stamped throughout with a literary quality very rare in this country, and of which I shall have a 30 word to say presently,—urbanity; in this production, the work of a man never to be named by any son of Oxford without sympathy, a man who alone in Oxford of his generation, alone of many generations, conveyed to us in his genius that same charm, that same ineffable sentiment, which this exquisite place itself conveys,—I mean Dr. Newman,—an expression is frequently used which is more common in theological than in literary language, but which seems to me fitted to be of general service; the note of so and so, the note of catholicity, the note of 40 antiquity, the note of sanctity, and so on. Adopting this expressive word, I say that in the bulk of the intellectual work of a nation which has no centre, no intellectual metropolis like an academy, like M. Sainte-Beuve's 'sovereign organ of opinion,' like M. Renan's 'recognised authority in matters of tone and taste,'—there is observable a note of provinciality. Now to get rid of provinciality is a certain stage of culture; a stage the positive result of which we must not make of too much importance, but which is, nevertheless, indispensable; for it brings us on to the platform where alone the best and highest intellectual work can be said fairly to begin. Work done after men have 10 reached this platform is classical; and that is the only work which, in the long run, can stand. All the scoriae in the work of men of great genius who have not lived on this platform, are due to their not having lived on it. Genius raises them to it by moments, and the portions of their work which are immortal are done at these moments; but more of it would have been immortal if they had not reached this platform at moments only, if they had had the culture which makes men live there.

ARNOLD

E

The less a literature has felt the influence of a supposed 20 centre of correct information, correct judgment, correct taste, the more we shall find in it this note of provinciality. I have shown the note of provinciality as caused by remoteness from a centre of correct information. Of course, the note of provinciality from the want of a centre of correct taste is still more visible, and it is also still more common. For here great—even the greatest—powers of mind most fail a man. Great powers of mind will make him inform himself thoroughly, great powers of mind will make him think profoundly, even with ignorance and platitude all 30 round him; but not even great powers of mind will keep his taste and style perfectly sound and sure, if he is left too much to himself, with no 'sovereign organ of opinion,' in these matters, near him. Even men like Jeremy Taylor and Burke suffer here. Take this passage from Taylor's funeral sermon on Lady Carbery:—

'So have I seen a river, deep and smooth, passing with a still foot and a sober face, and paying to the fiscus, the great exchequer of the sea, a tribute large and full; and hard by it, a little brook, skipping and making a 40 noise upon its unequal and neighbour bottom; and after all its talking and bragged motion, it paid to its common audit no more than the revenues of a little cloud or a contemptible vessel: so have I sometimes compared the issues of her religion to the solemnities and famed out-sides of another's piety.'

That passage has been much admired, and, indeed, the genius in it is undeniable. I should say, for my part, that genius, the ruling divinity of poetry, had been too busy in it, and intelligence, the ruling divinity of prose, 10 not busy enough. But can any one, with the best models of style in his head, help feeling the note of provinciality there, the want of simplicity, the want of measure, the want of just the qualities that make prose classical? If he does not feel what I mean, let him place beside the passage of Taylor this passage from the Panegyric of St. Paul, by Taylor's contemporary, Bossuet:—

‘Il ira, cet ignorant dans l'art de bien dire, avec cette locution rude, avec cette phrase qui sent l'étranger, il ira en cette Grèce polie, la mère des philosophes et des 20 orateurs; et malgré la résistance du monde, il y établira plus d'Églises que Platon n'y a gagné de disciples par cette éloquence qu'on a crue divine.’

There we have prose without the note of provinciality, —classical prose, prose of the centre.

Or take Burke, our greatest English prose-writer, as I think; take expressions like this:—

‘Blindfold themselves, like bulls that shut their eyes when they push, they drive, by the point of their bayonets, their slaves, blindfolded, indeed, no worse than their 30 lords, to take their fictions for currencies, and to swallow down paper pills by thirty-four millions sterling at a dose.’

Or this:—

‘They used it’ (the royal name) ‘as a sort of navel-string, to nourish their unnatural offspring from the bowels of royalty itself. Now that the monster can purvey for its own subsistence, it will only carry the mark about it, as a token of its having torn the womb it came from.’

Or this:—

40 ‘Without one natural pang, he’ (Rousseau) ‘casts away, as a sort of offal and excrement, the spawn of his disgustful amours, and sends his children to the hospital of foundlings.'

Or this :—

'I confess, I never liked this continual talk of resistance and revolution, or the practice of making the extreme medicine of the constitution its daily bread. It renders the habit of society dangerously valetudinary ; it is taking periodical doses of mercury sublimate and swallowing down repeated provocatives of cantharides to our love of liberty.'

10

I say that is extravagant prose ; prose too much suffered to indulge its caprices ; prose at too great a distance from the centre of good taste ; prose, in short, with the note of provinciality. People may reply, it is rich and imaginative ; yes, that is just it, it is Asiatic prose, as the ancient critics would have said ; prose somewhat barbarously rich and overloaded. But the true prose is Attic prose.

Well, but Addison's prose is Attic prose. Where, then, it may be asked, is the note of provinciality in Addison ? I answer, in the commonplace of his ideas.<sup>1</sup> This is a matter worth remarking. Addison claims to take leading rank as a moralist. To do that, you must have ideas of the first order on your subject,—the best ideas, at any rate, attainable in your time,—as well as be able to express them in a perfectly sound and sure style. Else you show your distance from the centre of ideas by your matter ; you are provincial by your matter, though you may not be provincial by your style. It is comparatively a small matter to express oneself well, if one will be content with <sup>1</sup> A critic says this is paradoxical, and urges that many second-rate French academicians have uttered the most commonplace ideas possible. I agree that many second-rate French academicians have uttered the most commonplace ideas possible ; but Addison is not a second-rate man. He is a man of the order, I will not say of Pascal, but at any rate of La Bruyère and Vauvenargues ; why does he not equal them ? I say, because of the medium in which he finds himself, the atmosphere in which he lives and works ; an atmosphere which tells unfavourably, or rather tends to tell unfavourably (for that is the truer way of putting it) either upon style or else upon ideas ; tends to make even a man of great ability either a Mr. Carlyle or else a Lord Macaulay.

It is to be observed, however, that Lord Macaulay's style has in its turn suffered by his failure in ideas, and this cannot be said of Addison's.

not expressing much, with expressing only trite ideas ; the problem is to express new and profound ideas in a perfectly sound and classical style. He is the true classic, in every age, who does that. Now Addison has not, on his subject of morals, the force of ideas of the moralists of the first class,—the classical moralists ; he has not the best ideas attainable in or about his time, and which were, so to speak, in the air then, to be seized by the finest spirits ; he is not to be compared for power, searchingness, or delicacy of 10 thought, to Pascal, or La Bruyère, or Vauvenargues ; he is rather on a level, in this respect, with a man like Marmontel ; therefore, I say, he has the note of provinciality as a moralist ; he is provincial by his matter, though not by his style.

To illustrate what I mean by an example. Addison, writing as a moralist on fixedness in religious faith, says :—

‘Those who delight in reading books of controversy do very seldom arrive at a fixed and settled habit of faith. The doubt which was laid revives again, and 20 shows itself in new difficulties ; and that generally for this reason,—because the mind, which is perpetually tossed in controversies and disputes, is apt to forget the reasons which had once set it at rest, and to be disquieted with any former perplexity when it appears in a new shape, or is started by a different hand.’

It may be said, that is classical English, perfect in lucidity, measure, and propriety. I make no objection ; but, in my turn, I say that the idea expressed is perfectly trite and barren, and that it is a note of provinciality in Addison,
 30 in a man whom a nation puts forward as one of its great moralists, to have no profounder and more striking idea to produce on this great subject. Compare, on the same subject, these words of a moralist really of the first order, really at the centre by his ideas,—Joubert :—

‘L’expérience de beaucoup d’opinions donne à l’esprit beaucoup de flexibilité et l’affermit dans celles qu’il croit les meilleures.’

With what a flash of light that touches the subject ! how it sets us thinking ! what a genuine contribution to 40 moral science it is !

In short, where there is no centre like an academy, if you have genius and powerful ideas, you are apt not to have the best style going; if you have precision of style and not genius, you are apt not to have the best ideas going.

The provincial spirit, again, exaggerates the value of its ideas for want of a high standard at hand by which to try them. Or rather, for want of such a standard, it gives one idea too much prominence at the expense of others; it orders its ideas amiss; it is hurried away by fancies; it likes and dislikes too passionately, too exclusively. Its admiration weeps hysterical tears, and its disapprobation foams at the mouth. So we get the eruptive and the aggressive manner in literature; the former prevails most in our criticism, the latter in our newspapers. For, not having the lucidity of a large and centrally placed intelligence, the provincial spirit has not its graciousness; it does not persuade, it makes war; it has not urbanity, the tone of the city, of the centre, the tone which always aims at a spiritual and intellectual effect, and not excluding the use of banter, never disjoins banter itself from politeness, from felicity. But the provincial tone is more violent, and seems to aim rather at an effect upon the blood and senses than upon the spirit and intellect; it loves hard-hitting rather than persuading. The newspaper, with its party spirit, its thorough-goingness, its resolute avoidance of shades and distinctions, its short, highly-charged, heavy-shotted, articles, its style so unlike that style lenis minimèque pertinax—easy and not too violently insisting,—which the ancients so much admired, is its true literature; the provincial spirit likes in the newspaper just what makes the newspaper such bad food for it,—just what made Goethe say, when he was pressed hard about the immorality of Byron's poems, that, after all, they were not so immoral as the newspapers. The French talk of the brutalité des journaux anglais. What strikes them comes from the necessary inherent tendencies of newspaper-writing not being checked in England by any centre of intelligent and urbane spirit, but rather stimulated by coming in contact with a provincial spirit. Even a newspaper like the Saturday Review, that old friend of all of us, a newspaper expressly aiming at an immunity from the common newspaper-spirit, aiming at being a sort of organ of reason,—and, by thus aiming, it merits great gratitude and has done great good,—even the Saturday Review, replying to some foreign criticism on our precautions against invasion, falls into a strain of this kind:—

‘To do this’ (to take these precautions) ‘seems to us eminently worthy of a great nation, and to talk of it as unworthy of a great nation, seems to us eminently 10 worthy of a great fool.’

There is what the French mean when they talk of the brutalité des journaux anglais; there is a style certainly as far removed from urbanity as possible,—a style with what I call the note of provinciality. And the same note may not unfrequently be observed even in the ideas of this newspaper, full as it is of thought and cleverness: certain ideas allowed to become fixed ideas, to prevail too absolutely. I will not speak of the immediate present, but, to go a little while back, it had the critic who so 20 disliked the Emperor of the French; it had the critic who so disliked the subject of my present remarks—academies; it had the critic who was so fond of the German element in our nation, and, indeed, everywhere; who ground his teeth if one said Charlemagne, instead of Charles the Great, and, in short, saw all things in Teutonism, as Malebranche saw all things in God. Certainly any one may fairly find faults in the Emperor Napoleon or in academies, and merit in the German element; but it is a note of the provincial spirit not to hold ideas of this kind a little more 30 easily, to be so devoured by them, to suffer them to become crotchets.

In England there needs a miracle of genius like Shakespeare’s to produce balance of mind, and a miracle of intellectual delicacy like Dr. Newman’s to produce urbanity of style. How prevalent all round us is the want of balance of mind and urbanity of style! How much, doubtless, it is to be found in ourselves,—in each of us! but, as human nature is constituted, every one can see it clearest in his contemporaries. There, above all, we should consider it, 40 because they and we are exposed to the same influences; and it is in the best of one’s contemporaries that it is most worth considering, because one then most feels the harm it does, when one sees what they would be without it. Think of the difference between Mr. Ruskin exercising his genius, and Mr. Ruskin exercising his intelligence ; consider the truth and beauty of this :—

‘Go out, in the spring-time, among the meadows that slope from the shores of the Swiss lakes to the roots of their lower mountains. There, mingled with the taller gentians and the white narcissus, the grass grows deep and free ; and as you follow the winding mountain paths, 10 beneath arching boughs all veiled and dim with blossom, —paths that for ever droop and rise over the green banks and mounds sweeping down in scented undulation, steep to the blue water, studded here and there with new-mown heaps, filling all the air with fainter sweetness,—look up towards the higher hills, where the waves of everlasting green roll silently into their long inlets among the shadows of the pines. . . .’

There is what the genius, the feeling, the temperament in Mr. Ruskin, the original and incommunicable part, 20 has to do with ; and how exquisite it is ! All the critic could possibly suggest, in the way of objection, would be, perhaps, that Mr. Ruskin is there trying to make prose do more than it can perfectly do ; that what he is there attempting he will never, except in poetry, be able to accomplish to his own entire satisfaction : but he accomplishes so much that the critic may well hesitate to suggest even this. Place beside this charming passage another,—a passage about Shakspeare’s names, where the intelligence and judgment of Mr. Ruskin, the acquired, trained, com- 30 municable part in him, are brought into play,—and see the difference :—

‘Of Shakspeare’s names I will afterwards speak at more length ; they are curiously—often barbarously—mixed out of various traditions and languages. Three of the clearest in meaning have been already noticed. Desdemona—“δυσδαιμονία”, miserable fortune—is also plain enough. Othello is, I believe, “the careful ;” all the calamity of the tragedy arising from the single flaw and error in his magnificently collected strength. Ophelia, 40 “serviceableness,” the true, lost wife of Hamlet, is marked as having a Greek name by that of her brother, Laertes ; and its signification is once exquisitely alluded to in that brother's last word of her, where her gentle preciousness is opposed to the uselessness of the churlish clergy :—

 "A ministering angel shall my sister be, when thou liest howling." Hamlet is, I believe, connected in some way with "homely," the entire event of the tragedy turning on betrayal of home duty. Hermione (ἑρμια), "pillar-like" (ἡ εἶδος ἔχει χρυσῆς Ἀφροδίτης) ; Titania (τιτάνη), "the queen" ; Benedict and Beatrice, "blessed and blessing" ; Valentine and Proteus, "enduring or strong" (valens), and "changeful." Iago and Iachimo have evidently the same root—probably the Spanish Iago, Jacob, "the supplanter."

Now, really, what a piece of extravagance all that is ! I will not say that the meaning of Shakspeare's names (I put aside the question as to the correctness of Mr. Ruskin's etymologies) has no effect at all, may be entirely lost sight of ; but to give it that degree of prominence is 20 to throw the reins to one's whim, to forget all moderation and proportion, to lose the balance of one's mind altogether. It is to show in one's criticism, to the highest excess, the note of provinciality.

Again, there is Mr. Palgrave, certainly endowed with a very fine critical tact ; his Golden Treasury abundantly proves it. The plan of arrangement which he devised for that work, the mode in which he followed his plan out, nay, one might even say, merely the juxtaposition, in pursuance of it, of two such pieces as those of Words-30 worth and Shelley which form the 285th and 286th in his collection, show a delicacy of feeling in these matters which is quite indisputable and very rare. And his notes are full of remarks which show it too. All the more striking, conjoined with so much justness of perception, are certain freaks and violences in Mr. Palgrave's criticism, mainly imputable, I think, to the critic's isolated position in this country, to his feeling himself too much left to take his own way, too much without any central authority representing high culture and sound judgment, by which 40 he may be, on the one hand, confirmed as against the ignorant, on the other, held in respect when he himself is inclined to take liberties. I mean such things as this note on Milton's line,—

'The great Emathian conqueror bade spare' . . .

'When Thebes was destroyed, Alexander ordered the house of Pindar to be spared. He was as incapable of appreciating the poet as Louis XIV of appreciating Racine; but even the narrow and barbarian mind of Alexander could understand the advantage of a showy act of homage to poetry.' A note like that I call a freak or a violence; if this disparaging view of Alexander and Louis XIV, so 10 unlike the current view, is wrong,—if the current view is, after all, the truer one of them,—the note is a freak. But, even if its disparaging view is right, the note is a violence; for, abandoning the true mode of intellectual action—persuasion, the instilment of conviction,—it simply astounds and irritates the hearer by contradicting without a word of proof or preparation, his fixed and familiar notions; and this is mere violence. In either case, the fitness, the measure, the centrality, which is the soul of all good criticism, is lost, and the note of provinciality 20 shows itself.

Thus in the famous Handbook, marks of a fine power of perception are everywhere discernible, but so, too, are marks of the want of sure balance, of the check and support afforded by knowing one speaks before good and severe judges. When Mr. Palgrave dislikes a thing, he feels no pressure constraining him either to try his dislike closely or to express it moderately; he does not mince matters, he gives his dislike all its own way; both his judgment and his style would gain if he were under more restraint. 30

'The style which has filled London with the dead monotony of Gower or Harley Streets, or the pale commonplace of Belgravia, Tyburnia and Kensington; which has pierced Paris and Madrid with the feeble frivolities of the Rue Rivoli and the Strada de Toledo.' He dislikes the architecture of the Rue Rivoli, and he puts it on a level with the architecture of Belgravia and Gower Street; he lumps them all together in one condemnation, he loses sight of the shade, the distinction, which is everything here; the distinction, namely, that the architecture of the Rue Rivoli 40 expresses show, splendour, pleasure,—unworthy things, perhaps, to express alone and for their own sakes, but it expresses them; whereas the architecture of Gower Street and Belgravia merely expresses the impotence of the architect to express anything. Then, as to style: ‘sculpture which stands in a contrast with Woolner hardly more shameful than diverting,’ . . . ‘passing from Davy or Faraday to the art of the mountebank or the science of the spirit-rapper.’ . . . ‘it is the old, old story with Marochetti, the frog trying to blow himself out to bull dimensions. He may puff and be puffed, but he will never do it.’ We all remember that shower of amenities on poor M. Marochetti. Now, here Mr. Palgrave himself enables us to form a contrast which lets us see just what the presence of an academy does for style; for he quotes a criticism by M. Gustave Planche on this very M. Marochetti. M. Gustave Planche was a critic of the very first order, a man of strong opinions, which he expressed with severity; he, too, condemns M. Marochetti’s work, and Mr. Palgrave calls him as a witness to back what he has himself said; certainly Mr. Palgrave’s translation will not exaggerate M. Planche’s urbanity in dealing with M. Marochetti, but, even in this translation, see the difference in sobriety, in measure, between the critic writing in Paris and the critic writing in London:—

‘These conditions are so elementary, that I am at a perfect loss to comprehend how M. Marochetti has neglected them. There are soldiers here like the leaden playthings of the nursery: it is almost impossible to guess whether there is a body beneath the dress. We have here no question of style, not even of grammar; it is nothing beyond mere matter of the alphabet of art. To break these conditions is the same as to be ignorant of spelling.’

That is really more formidable criticism than Mr. Palgrave’s, and yet in how perfectly temperate a style! M. Planche’s advantage is, that he feels himself to be speaking before competent judges, that there is a force of cultivated opinion for him to appeal to. Therefore, he must not be extravagant, and he need not storm; he must satisfy the reason and taste,—that is his business. Mr. Palgrave, on the other hand, feels himself to be speaking before a promiscuous multitude, with the few good judges so scattered through it as to be powerless; therefore, he has no calm confidence and no self-control; he relies on the strength of his lungs; he knows that big words impose on the mob, and that, even if he is outrageous, most of his audience are apt to be a great deal more so.<sup>1</sup>

Again, the first two volumes of Mr. Kinglake's Invasion of the Crimea were certainly among the most successful and renowned English books of our time. Their style was one of the most renowned things about them, and yet how <sup>10</sup> conspicuous a fault in Mr. Kinglake's style is this overcharge of which I have been speaking! Mr. James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald, says, I believe, that the highest achievement of the human intellect is what he calls 'a good editorial.' This is not quite so; but, if it were so, on what a height would these two volumes by Mr. Kinglake stand! I have already spoken of the Attic and the Asiatic styles; besides these, there is the Corinthian style. That is the style for 'a good editorial,' and Mr. Kinglake <sup>20</sup> has really reached perfection in it. It has not the warm glow, blithe movement, and soft pliancy of life, as the Attic style has; it has not the over-heavy richness and encumbered gait of the Asiatic style; it has glitter without warmth, rapidity without ease, effectiveness without charm. Its characteristic is, that it has no soul; all it exists for, is to get its ends, to make its points, to damage its adversaries, to be admired, to triumph. A style so bent on effect at the expense of soul, simplicity, and delicacy; a style so little studious of the charm of the great models; so far from classic truth and grace, must surely be said to <sup>30</sup> have the note of provinciality. Yet Mr. Kinglake's talent is a really eminent one, and so in harmony with our intellectual habits and tendencies, that, to the great bulk of English people, the faults of his style seem its merits; all the more needful that criticism should not be dazzled by them, but should try closely this, the form of his work. The matter of the work is a separate thing; and, indeed, this has been, I believe, withdrawn from discussion, <sup>1</sup> When I wrote this I had before me the first edition of Mr. Palgrave's Handbook. I am bound to say that in the second edition much strong language has been expunged, and what remains, softened.

Mr. Kinglake declaring that this must and shall stay as it is, and that he is resolved, like Pontius Pilate, to stand by what he has written. And here, I must say, he seems to me to be quite right. On the breast of the huge Mississippi of falsehood called history, a foam-bell more or less is of no consequence. But he may, at any rate, ease and soften his style.

We must not compare a man of Mr. Kinglake's literary talent with French writers like M. de Bazancourt. We 10 must compare him with M. Thiers. And what a superiority in style has M. Thiers from being formed in a good school, with severe traditions, wholesome restraining influences! Even in this age of Mr. James Gordon Bennett, his style has nothing Corinthian about it, its lightness and brightness make it almost Attic. It is not quite Attic, however; it has not the infallible sureness of Attic taste. Sometimes his head gets a little hot with the fumes of patriotism, and then he crosses the line, he loses perfect measure, he declaims, he raises a momentary smile. France condemned 'à être 20 l'effroi du monde dont elle pourrait être l'amour,'—Caesar, whose exquisite simplicity M. Thiers so much admires, would not have written like that. There is, if I may be allowed to say so, the slightest possible touch of fatuity in such language,—of that failure in good sense which comes from too warm a self-satisfaction. But compare this language with Mr. Kinglake's Marshal St. Arnaud—'dismissed from the presence' of Lord Raglan or Lord Stratford, 'cowed and pressed down' under their 'stern reproofs,' or under 'the majesty of the great Elchi's Canning brow and 30 tight, merciless lips!' The failure in good sense and good taste there reaches far beyond what the French mean by fatuity; they would call it by another word, a word expressing blank defect of intelligence, a word for which we have no exact equivalent in English,—bête. It is the difference between a venial, momentary, good-tempered excess, in a man of the world, of an amiable and social weakness,—vanity; and a serious, settled, fierce, narrow, provincial misconception of the whole relative value of one's own things and the things of others. So baneful to 40 the style of even the cleverest man may be the total want of checks.

In all I have said, I do not pretend that the examples given prove my rule as to the influence of academies; they only illustrate it. Examples in plenty might very likely be found to set against them; the truth of the rule depends, no doubt, on whether the balance of all the examples is in its favour or not; but actually to strike this balance is always out of the question. Here, as everywhere else, the rule, the idea, if true, commends itself to the judicious, and then the examples make it clearer still to them. This is the real use of examples, and this alone<sup>10</sup> is the purpose which I have meant mine to serve. There is also another side to the whole question,—as to the limiting and prejudicial operation which academies may have; but this side of the question it rather behoves the French, not us, to study.

The reader will ask for some practical conclusion about the establishment of an Academy in this country, and perhaps I shall hardly give him the one he expects. But nations have their own modes of acting, and these modes are not easily changed; they are even consecrated, when<sup>20</sup> great things have been done in them. When a literature has produced Shakspeare and Milton, when it has even produced Barrow and Burke, it cannot well abandon its traditions; it can hardly begin, at this late time of day, with an institution like the French Academy. I think academies with a limited, special, scientific scope, in the various lines of intellectual work,—academies like that of Berlin, for instance,—we with time may, and probably shall, establish. And no doubt they will do good; no doubt the presence of such influential centres of correct<sup>30</sup> information will tend to raise the standard amongst us for what I have called the journeyman-work of literature, and to free us from the scandal of such biographical dictionaries as Chalmers's, or such translations as a recent one of Spinoza, or perhaps, such philological freaks as Mr. Forster's about the one primeval language. But an academy quite like the French Academy, a sovereign organ of the highest literary opinion, a recognised authority in matters of intellectual tone and taste, we shall hardly have, and perhaps we ought not to wish to have it. But<sup>40</sup> then every one amongst us with any turn for literature will do well to remember to what shortcomings and excesses, which such an academy tends to correct, we are liable ; and the more liable, of course, for not having it. He will do well constantly to try himself in respect of these, steadily to widen his culture, severely to check in himself the provincial spirit ; and he will do this the better the more he keeps in mind that all mere glorification by ourselves of ourselves or our literature, in the strain of what, at the beginning of these remarks, I quoted from Lord Macaulay, is both vulgar, and, besides being vulgar, retarding.

MAURICE DE GUÉRIN

I WILL not presume to say that I now know the French language well ; but at a time when I knew it even less well than at present,—some fifteen years ago,—I remember pestering those about me with this sentence, the rhythm of which had lodged itself in my head, and which, with the strangest pronunciation possible, I kept perpetually declaiming : ‘ Les dieux jaloux ont enfoui quelque part les témoignages de la descendance des choses ; mais au bord de quel Océan ont-ils roulé la pierre qui les couvre, ô Macarée! ’

These words come from a short composition called <sup>10</sup> the Centaur, of which the author, Georges-Maurice de Guérin, died in the year 1839, at the age of twenty-eight, without having published anything. In 1840, Madame Sand brought out the Centaur in the Revue des Deux Mondes, with a short notice of its author, and a few extracts from his letters. A year or two afterwards she reprinted these at the end of a volume of her novels ; and there it was that I fell in with them. I was so much struck with the Centaur that I waited anxiously to hear something more of its author, and of what he had left ; but it was not <sup>20</sup> till the other day—twenty years after the first publication of the Centaur in the Revue des Deux Mondes, that my anxiety was satisfied. At the end of 1860 appeared two volumes with the title, Maurice de Guérin, Reliquiae, containing the Centaur, several poems of Guérin, his journals, and a number of his letters, collected and edited by a devoted friend, M. Trebutien, and preceded by a notice of Guérin by the first of living critics, M. Sainte-Beuve.

The grand power of poetry is its interpretative power ; by which I mean, not a power of drawing out in black <sup>30</sup> and white an explanation of the mystery of the universe, but the power of so dealing with things as to awaken in us a wonderfully full, new, and intimate sense of them, and of our relations with them. When this sense is awakened in us, as to objects without us, we feel ourselves to be in contact with the essential nature of those objects, to be no longer bewildered and oppressed by them, but to have their secret, and to be in harmony with them; and this feeling calms and satisfies us as no other can. Poetry, indeed, interprets in another way besides this; but one of its two ways of interpreting, of exercising its highest power, is by awakening this sense in us. I will not now inquire whether this sense is illusive, whether it 10 can be proved not to be illusive, whether it does absolutely make us possess the real nature of things; all I say is, that poetry can awaken it in us, and that to awaken it is one of the highest powers of poetry. The interpretations of science do not give us this intimate sense of objects as the interpretations of poetry give it; they appeal to a limited faculty, and not to the whole man. It is not Linnaeus, or Cavendish, or Cuvier who gives us the true sense of animals, or water, or plants, who seizes their secret for us, who makes us participate in their life; it is 20 Shakspeare, with his

‘daffodils
 That come before the swallow dares, and take The winds of March with beauty;’

it is Wordsworth, with his ‘voice . . . heard

 In spring-time from the cuckoo-bird,
 Breaking the silence of the seas
 Among the farthest Hebrides;’

it is Keats, with his

30 ‘moving waters at their priestlike task
 Of cold ablution round Earth’s human shores;’

it is Chateaubriand, with his ‘cime indéterminée des forêts; it is Senancour, with his mountain birch-tree: ‘Cette écorce blanche, lisse et crevassée; cette tige agreste; ces branches qui s’inclinent vers la terre; la mobilité des feuilles, et tout cet abandon, simplicité de la nature, attitude des déserts.’

Eminent manifestations of this magical power of poetry are very rare and very precious: the compositions of Guérin manifest it, I think, in singular eminence. Not 40 his poems, strictly so called,—his verse,—so much as his prose ; his poems in general take for their vehicle that favourite metre of French poetry, the Alexandrine ; and, in my judgment, I confess they have thus, as compared with his prose, a great disadvantage to start with. In prose, the character of the vehicle for the composer's thoughts is not determined beforehand ; every composer has to make his own vehicle ; and who has ever done this more admirably than the great prose-writers of France,—Pascal, Bossuet, Fénelon, Voltaire ? But in verse the composer has (with comparatively narrow liberty of 10 modification) to accept his vehicle ready-made ; it is therefore of vital importance to him that he should find at his disposal a vehicle adequate to convey the highest matters of poetry. We may even get a decisive test of the poetical power of a language and nation by ascertaining how far the principal poetical vehicle which they have employed, how far (in plainer words) the established national metre for high poetry, is adequate or inadequate. It seems to me that the established metre of this kind in France,—the Alexandrine,—is inadequate ; that as 20 a vehicle for high poetry it is greatly inferior to the hexameter or to the iambics of Greece (for example), or to the blank verse of England. Therefore the man of genius who uses it is at a disadvantage as compared with the man of genius who has for conveying his thoughts a more adequate vehicle, metrical or not. Racine is at a disadvantage as compared with Sophocles or Shakspeare, and he is likewise at a disadvantage as compared with Bossuet. The same may be said of our own poets of the eighteenth century, a century which gave them as the main vehicle for their 30 high poetry a metre inadequate (as much as the French Alexandrine, and nearly in the same way) for this poetry,—the ten-syllable couplet. It is worth remarking, that the English poet of the eighteenth century whose compositions wear best and give one the most entire satisfaction,—Gray,—hardly uses that couplet at all : this abstinence, however, limits Gray's productions to a few short compositions, and (exquisite as these are) he is a poetical nature repressed and without free issue. For English poetical production on a great scale, for an English poet deploying all the forces 40 of his genius, the ten-syllable couplet was, in the eighteenth century, the established, one may almost say the inevitable, channel. Now this couplet, admirable (as Chaucer uses it) for story-telling not of the epic pitch, and often admirable for a few lines even in poetry of a very high pitch, is for continuous use in poetry of this latter kind inadequate. Pope, in his Essay on Man, is thus at a disadvantage compared with Lucretius in his poem on Nature : Lucretius has an adequate vehicle, Pope has not. Nay, though Pope's genius for didactic poetry was not less than that of 10 Horace, while his satirical power was certainly greater, still one's taste receives, I cannot but think, a certain satisfaction when one reads the Epistles and Satires of Horace, which it fails to receive when one reads the Satires and Epistles of Pope. Of such avail is the superior adequacy of the vehicle used to compensate even an inferiority of genius in the user ! In the same way Pope is at a disadvantage as compared with Addison. The best of Addison's composition (the 'Coverley Papers' in the Spectator, for instance) wears better than the best of Pope's, because 20 Addison has in his prose an intrinsically better vehicle for his genius than Pope in his couplet. But Bacon has no such advantage over Shakspeare ; nor has Milton, writing prose (for no contemporary English prose-writer must be matched with Milton except Milton himself), any such advantage over Milton writing verse : indeed, the advantage here is all the other way.

ARNOLD

F

It is in the prose remains of Guérin,—his journals, his letters, and the striking composition which I have already mentioned, the Centaur,—that his extraordinary gift 30 manifests itself. He has a truly interpretative faculty ; the most profound and delicate sense of the life of Nature, and the most exquisite felicity in finding expressions to render that sense. To all who love poetry, Guérin deserves to be something more than a name ; and I shall try, in spite of the impossibility of doing justice to such a master of expression by translations, to make my English readers see for themselves how gifted an organisation his was, and how few artists have received from Nature a more magical faculty of interpreting her.

40 In the winter of the year 1832 there was collected in Brittany, around the well-known Abbé Lamennais, a singular gathering. At a lonely place, La Chênaie, he had founded a religious retreat, to which disciples, attracted by his powers or by his reputation, repaired. Some came with the intention of preparing themselves for the ecclesiastical profession; others merely to profit by the society and discourse of so distinguished a master. Among the inmates were men whose names have since become known to all Europe,—Lacordaire and M. de Montalembert; there were others, who have acquired a reputation, not 10 European, indeed, but considerable,—the Abbé Gerbet, the Abbé Rohrbacher; others, who have never quitted the shade of private life. The winter of 1832 was a period of crisis in the religious world of France: Lamennais's rupture with Rome, the condemnation of his opinions by the Pope, and his revolt against that condemnation, were imminent. Some of his followers, like Lacordaire, had already resolved not to cross the Rubicon with their leader, not to go into rebellion against Rome; they were preparing to separate from him. The society of La Chênaie was soon 20 to dissolve; but, such as it is shown to us for a moment, with its voluntary character, its simple and severe life in common, its mixture of lay and clerical members, the genius of its chiefs, the sincerity of its disciples,—above all, its paramount fervent interest in matters of spiritual and religious concernment,—it offers a most instructive spectacle. It is not the spectacle we most of us think to find in France, the France we have imagined from common English notions, from the streets of Paris, from novels; it shows us how, wherever there is greatness like that of France, there are, 30 as its foundation, treasures of fervour, pure-mindedness, and spirituality somewhere, whether we know of them or not;—a store of that which Goethe calls Halt;—since greatness can never be founded upon frivolity and corruption.

On the evening of the 18th of December in this year 1832, M. de Lamennais was talking to those assembled in the sitting-room of La Chênaie of his recent journey to Italy. He talked with all his usual animation; 'but,' writes one of his hearers, a Breton gentleman, M. de 40 Marzan, 'I soon became inattentive and absent, being struck with the reserved attitude of a young stranger some twenty-two years old, pale in face, his black hair already thin over his temples, with a southern eye, in which brightness and melancholy were mingled. He kept himself somewhat aloof, seeming to avoid notice rather than to court it. All the old faces of friends which I found about me at this my re-entry into the circle of La Chênaie failed to occupy me so much as the sight of this stranger, looking on, listening, observing, and saying nothing.'

- 10 The unknown was Maurice de Guérin. Of a noble but poor family, having lost his mother at six years old, he had been brought up by his father, a man saddened by his wife's death, and austere religious, at the château of Le Cayla, in Languedoc. His childhood was not gay; he had not the society of other boys; and solitude, the sight of his father's gloom, and the habit of accompanying the curé of the parish on his rounds among the sick and dying, made him prematurely grave and familiar with sorrow. He went to school first at Toulouse, then at the
- 20 Collège Stanislas at Paris, with a temperament almost as unfit as Shelley's for common school life. His youth was ardent, sensitive, agitated, and unhappy. In 1832 he procured admission to La Chênaie to brace his spirit by the teaching of Lamennais, and to decide whether his religious feelings would determine themselves into a distinct religious vocation. Strong and deep religious feelings he had, implanted in him by nature, developed in him by the circumstances of his childhood; but he had also (and here is the key to his character) that temperament which
- 30 opposes itself to the fixedness of a religious vocation, or of any vocation of which fixedness is an essential attribute; a temperament mobile, inconstant, eager, thirsting for new impressions, abhorring rules, aspiring to a 'renovation without end;' a temperament common enough among artists, but with which few artists, who have it to the same degree as Guérin, unite a seriousness and a sad intensity like his. After leaving school, and before going to La Chênaie, he had been at home at Le Cayla with his sister Eugénie (a wonderfully gifted person, whose genius so
- 40 competent a judge as M. Sainte-Beuve is inclined to pronounce even superior to her brother's) and his sister

Eugénie's friends. With one of these friends he had fallen in love,—a slight and transient fancy, but which had already called his poetical powers into exercise; and his poems and fragments, in a certain green note-book (le Cahier Vert) which he long continued to make the depository of his thoughts, and which became famous among his friends, he brought with him to La Chênaie. There he found among the younger members of the Society several who, like himself, had a secret passion for poetry and literature; with these he became intimate, and in his 10 letters and journal we find him occupied, now with a literary commerce established with these friends, now with the fortunes, fast coming to a crisis, of the Society, and now with that for the sake of which he came to La Chênaie,—his religious progress and the state of his soul.

On Christmas-day, 1832, having been then three weeks at La Chênaie, he writes thus of it to a friend of his family, M. de Bayne:—

'La Chênaie is a sort of oasis in the midst of the steppes of Brittany. In front of the château stretches a very 20 large garden, cut in two by a terrace with a lime avenue, at the end of which is a tiny chapel. I am extremely fond of this little oratory, where one breathes a twofold peace,—the peace of solitude and the peace of the Lord. When spring comes we shall walk to prayers between two borders of flowers. On the east side, and only a few yards from the château, sleeps a small mere between two woods, where the birds in warm weather sing all day long; and then,—right, left, on all sides,—woods, woods, everywhere woods. It looks desolate just now that all is bare and the 30 woods are rust-colour, and under this Brittany sky, which is always clouded and so low that it seems as if it were going to fall on your head; but as soon as spring comes the sky raises itself up, the woods come to life again, and everything will be full of charm.'

Of what La Chênaie will be when spring comes he has a foretaste on the 3rd of March.

'To-day' (he writes in his journal) 'has enchanted me. For the first time for a long while the sun has shown himself in all his beauty. He has made the buds of the 40 leaves and flowers swell, and he has waked up in me a thousand happy thoughts. The clouds assume more and more their light and graceful shapes, and are sketching, over the blue sky, the most charming fancies. The woods have not yet got their leaves, but they are taking an indescribable air of life and gaiety, which gives them quite a new physiognomy. Everything is getting ready for the great festival of Nature.'

Storm and snow adjourn this festival a little longer. On the 11th of March he writes :—

10 'It has snowed all night. I have been to look at our primroses ; each of them had its small load of snow, and was bowing its head under its burden. These pretty flowers, with their rich yellow colour, had a charming effect under their white hoods. I saw whole tufts of them roofed over by a single block of snow ; all these laughing flowers thus shrouded and leaning one upon another, made one think of a group of young girls surprised by a shower, and sheltering under a white apron.'

The burst of spring comes at last, though late. On the 20 5th of April we find Guérin 'sitting in the sun to penetrate himself to the very marrow with the divine spring.' On the 3rd of May, 'one can actually see the progress of the green ; it has made a start from the garden to the shrub-beries, it is getting the upper hand all along the mere ; it leaps, one may say, from tree to tree, from thicket to thicket, in the fields and on the hill-sides ; and I can see it already arrived at the forest edge and beginning to spread itself over the broad back of the forest. Soon it will have overrun everything as far as the eye can reach, 30 and all those wide spaces between here and the horizon will be moving and sounding like one vast sea, a sea of emerald.'

Finally, on the 16th of May, he writes to M. de Bayne that 'the gloomy and bad days—bad because they bring temptation by their gloom,—are, thanks to God and the spring, over ; and I see approaching a long file of shining and happy days, to do me all the good in the world. This Brittany of ours,' he continues, 'gives one the idea of the greyest and most wrinkled old woman possible suddenly 40 changed back by the touch of a fairy's wand into a girl of twenty, and one of the loveliest in the world ; the fine weather has so decked and beautified the dear old country.' He felt, however, the cloudiness and cold of the 'dear old country' with all the sensitiveness of a child of the South. 'What a difference,' he cries, 'between the sky of Brittany, even on the finest day, and the sky of our South! Here the summer has, even on its highdays and holidays, something mournful, overcast, and stinted about it. It is like a miser who is making a show; there is a niggardliness in his magnificence. Give me our Languedoc sky, so bountiful of light, so blue, so largely vaulted!' And somewhat <sup>10</sup> later, complaining of the short and dim sunlight of a February day in Paris, 'What a sunshine,' he exclaims, 'to gladden eyes accustomed to all the wealth of light of the South!—aux larges et libérales effusions de lumière du ciel du Midi.'

In the long winter of La Chênaie his great resource was literature. One has often heard that an educated Frenchman's reading seldom goes much beyond French and Latin, and that he makes the authors in these two languages his sole literary standard. This may or may not <sup>20</sup> be true of Frenchmen in general, but there can be no question as to the width of the reading of Guérin and his friends, and as to the range of their literary sympathies. One of the circle, Hippolyte la Morvonnais,—a poet who published a volume of verse, and died in the prime of life,—had a passionate admiration for Wordsworth, and had even, it is said, made a pilgrimage to Rydal Mount to visit him; and in Guérin's own reading I find, besides the French names of Bernardin de St. Pierre, Chateaubriand, Lamartine, and Victor Hugo, the names of Homer, <sup>30</sup> Dante, Shakspeare, Milton, and Goethe; and he quotes both from Greek and from English authors in the original. His literary tact is beautifully fine and true. 'Every poet,' he writes to his sister, 'has his own art of poetry written on the ground of his own soul; there is no other. Be constantly observing Nature in her smallest details, and then write as the current of your thoughts guides you;—that is all.' But with all this freedom from the bondage of forms and rules, Guérin marks with perfect precision the faults of the free French literature of his <sup>40</sup> time,—the littérature facile,—and judges the romantic school and its prospects like a master: 'that youthful literature which has put forth all its blossom prematurely, and has left itself a helpless prey to the returning frost, stimulated as it has been by the burning sun of our century, by this atmosphere charged with a perilous heat, which has over-hastened every sort of development, and will most likely reduce to a handful of grains the harvest of our age.' And the popular authors,—those 'whose name appears once and disappears for ever, whose books, 10 unwelcome to all serious people, welcome to the rest of the world, to novelty-hunters and novel-readers, fill with vanity these vain souls, and then, falling from hands heavy with the languor of satiety, drop for ever into the gulf of oblivion;' and those, more noteworthy, 'the writers of books celebrated, and, as works of art, deserving celebrity, but which have in them not one grain of that hidden manna, not one of those sweet and wholesome thoughts which nourish the human soul and refresh it when it is weary,'—these he treats with such severity 20 that he may in some sense be described, as he describes himself, as 'invoking with his whole heart a classical restoration.' He is best described, however, not as a partisan of any school, but as an ardent seeker for that mode of expression which is the most natural, happy, and true. He writes to his sister Eugénie:—

'I want you to reform your system of composition; it is too loose, too vague, too Lamartinian. Your verse is too sing-song; it does not talk enough. Form for yourself a style of your own, which shall be your real expression. 30 Study the French language by attentive reading, making it your care to remark constructions, turns of expression, delicacies of style, but without ever adopting the manner of any master. In the works of these masters we must learn our language, but we must use it each in our own fashion.'<sup>1</sup>

It was not, however, to perfect his literary judgment that Guérin came to La Chênaie. The religious feeling, which was as much a part of his essence as the passion for Nature and the literary instinct, shows itself at moments jealous of these its rivals, and alarmed at their predominance. Like all powerful feelings, it wants to exclude every other feeling and to be absolute. One Friday in April, after he has been delighting himself with the shapes of the clouds and the progress of the spring, he suddenly bethinks himself that the day is Good Friday, and exclaims in his diary :—

<sup>1</sup> Part of these extracts date from a time a little after Guérin's residence at La Chênaie; but already, amidst the readings and conversations of La Chênaie, his literary judgment was perfectly formed.

‘My God, what is my soul about that it can thus go running after such fugitive delights on Good Friday, on <sup>10</sup> this day all filled with thy death and our redemption? There is in me I know not what damnable spirit, that awakens in me strong discontents, and is for ever prompting me to rebel against the holy exercises and the devout collectedness of soul which are the meet preparation for these great solemnities of our faith. Oh how well can I trace here the old leaven, from which I have not yet perfectly cleared my soul!’

And again, in a letter to M. de Marzan : ‘Of what, my God, are we made,’ he cries, ‘that a little verdure and <sup>20</sup> a few trees should be enough to rob us of our tranquillity and to distract us from thy love?’ And writing, three days after Easter Sunday, in his journal, he records the reception at La Chênaie of a fervent neophyte, in words which seem to convey a covert blame of his own want of fervency :—

‘Three days have passed over our heads since the great festival. One anniversary the less for us yet to spend of the death and resurrection of our Saviour! Every year thus bears away with it its solemn festivals; when <sup>30</sup> will the everlasting festival be here? I have been witness of a most touching sight; François has brought us one of his friends whom he has gained to the faith. This neophyte joined us in our exercises during the Holy week, and on Easter-day he received the communion with us. François was in raptures. It is a truly good work which he has thus done. François is quite young, hardly twenty years old; M. de la M. is thirty, and is married. There is something most touching and beautifully simple in M. de la M. letting himself thus be brought to God by quite <sup>40</sup> a young man; and to see friendship, on François’s side, thus doing the work of an Apostle, is not less beautiful and touching.'

Admiration for Lamennais worked in the same direction with this feeling. Lamennais never appreciated Guérin; his combative, rigid, despotic nature, of which the characteristic was energy, had no affinity with Guérin's elusive, undulating, impalpable nature, of which the characteristic was delicacy. He set little store by his new disciple, and could hardly bring himself to understand what others 10 found so remarkable in him, his own genuine feeling towards him being one of indulgent compassion. But the intuition of Guérin, more discerning than the logic of his master, instinctively felt what there was commanding and tragic in Lamennais's character, different as this was from his own; and some of his notes are among the most interesting records of Lamennais which remain.

"Do you know what it is," M. Féli<sup>1</sup> said to us on the evening of the day before yesterday, "which makes man the most suffering of all creatures? It is that he 20 has one foot in the finite and the other in the infinite, and that he is torn asunder, not by four horses, as in the horrible old times, but between two worlds." Again he said to us as we heard the clock strike: "If that clock knew that it was to be destroyed the next instant, it would still keep striking its hour until that instant arrived. My children, be as the clock; whatever may be going to happen to you, strike always your hour."

Another time Guérin writes,

'To-day M. Féli startled us. He was sitting behind 30 the chapel, under the two Scotch firs; he took his stick and marked out a grave on the turf, and said to Elie, "It is there I wish to be buried, but no tombstone! only a simple hillock of grass. Oh, how well I shall be there!" Elie thought he had a presentiment that his end was near. This is not the first time he has been visited by such a presentiment; when he was setting out for Rome, he said to those here: "I do not expect ever to come back to you; you must do the good which I have failed to do." He is impatient for death.'

<sup>1</sup> The familiar name given to M. de Lamennais by his followers at La Chênaie.

Overpowered by the ascendancy of Lamennais, Guérin, in spite of his hesitations, in spite of his confession to himself that 'after a three weeks' close scrutiny of his soul, in the hope of finding the pearl of a religious vocation hidden in some corner of it,' he had failed to find what he sought, took, at the end of August, 1833, a decisive step. He joined the religious order which Lamennais had founded. But at this very moment the deepening displeasure of Rome with Lamennais determined the Bishop of Rennes to break up, in so far as it was a religious 10 congregation, the Society of La Chênaie, to transfer the novices to Ploërmel, and to place them under other superintendence. In September, Lamennais, 'who had not yet ceased,' writes M. de Marzan, a fervent Catholic, 'to be a Christian and a priest, took leave of his beloved colony of La Chênaie, with the anguish of a general who disbands his army down to the last recruit, and withdraws annihilated from the field of battle.' Guérin went to Ploërmel. But here, in the seclusion of a real religious house, he instantly perceived how alien to a spirit like 20 his,—a spirit which, as he himself says somewhere, 'had need of the open air, wanted to see the sun and the flowers,'—was the constraint and monotony of a monastic life, when Lamennais's genius was no longer present to enliven this life for him. On the 7th of October he renounced the novitiate, believing himself a partisan of Lamennais in his quarrel with Rome, reproaching the life he had left with demanding passive obedience instead of trying 'to put in practice the admirable alliance of order with liberty, and of variety with unity,' and declaring that, for his 30 part, he preferred taking the chances of a life of adventure to submitting himself to be 'garrotté par un règlement,—tied hand and foot by a set of rules.' In real truth, a life of adventure, or rather a life free to wander at its own will, was that to which his nature irresistibly impelled him.

For a career of adventure, the inevitable field was Paris. But before this career began, there came a stage, the smoothest, perhaps, and the most happy in the short life of Guérin. M. la Morvonnais, one of his La Chênaie friends,—some years older than Guérin, and married to 40 a wife of singular sweetness and charm,—had a house by the seaside at the mouth of one of the beautiful rivers of Brittany, the Arguenon. He asked Guérin, when he left Ploërmel, to come and stay with him at this place, called Le Val de l'Arguenon, and Guérin spent the winter of 1833-4 there. I grudge every word about Le Val and its inmates which is not Guérin's own, so charming is the picture he draws of them, so truly does his talent find itself in its best vein as he draws it.

'How full of goodness' (he writes in his journal of 10 the 7th of December) 'is Providence to me! For fear the sudden passage from the mild and temperate air of a religious life to the torrid clime of the world should be too trying for my soul, it has conducted me, after I have left my sacred shelter, to a house planted on the frontier between the two regions, where, without being in solitude, one is not yet in the world; a house whose windows look on the one side towards the plain where the tumult of men is rocking, on the other towards the wilderness where the servants of God are chanting. I intend to write down 20 the record of my sojourn here, for the days here spent are full of happiness, and I know that in the time to come I shall often turn back to the story of these past felicities. A man, pious, and a poet; a woman, whose spirit is in such perfect sympathy with his that you would say they had but one being between them; a child, called Marie like her mother, and who sends, like a star, the first rays of her love and thought through the white cloud of infancy; a simple life in an old-fashioned house; the ocean, which comes morning and evening to bring us its harmonies; 30 and lastly, a wanderer who descends from Carmel and is going on to Babylon, and who has laid down at this threshold his staff and his sandals, to take his seat at the hospitable table;—here is matter to make a biblical poem of, if I could only describe things as I can feel them!'

Every line written by Guérin during this stay at Le Val is worth quoting, but I have only room for one extract more:—

'Never' (he writes, a fortnight later, on the 20th of December), 'never have I tasted so inwardly and deeply 40 the happiness of home-life. All the little details of this life which in their succession make up the day, are to me so many stages of a continuous charm carried from one end of the day to the other. The morning greeting, which in some sort renews the pleasure of the first arrival, for the words with which one meets are almost the same, and the separation at night, through the hours of darkness and uncertainty, does not ill represent longer separations ; then breakfast, during which you have the fresh enjoyment of having met together again ; the stroll afterwards, when we go out and bid Nature good-morning ; the return and setting to work in an old panelled chamber looking out on <sup>10</sup> the sea, inaccessible to all the stir of the house, a perfect sanctuary of labour ; dinner, to which we are called, not by a bell, which reminds one too much of school or a great house, but by a pleasant voice ; the gaiety, the merriment, the talk flitting from one subject to another and never dropping so long as the meal lasts ; the crackling fire of dry branches to which we draw our chairs directly afterwards, the kind words that are spoken round the warm flame which sings while we talk ; and then, if it is fine, the walk by the seaside, when the sea has for its visitors <sup>20</sup> a mother with her child in her arms, this child's father and a stranger, each of these two last with a stick in his hand ; the rosy lips of the little girl, which keep talking at the same time with the waves,—now and then tears shed by her and cries of childish fright at the edge of the sea ; our thoughts, the father's and mine, as we stand and look at the mother and child smiling at one another, or at the child in tears and the mother trying to comfort it by her caresses and exhortations ; the Ocean, going on all the while rolling up his waves and noises ; the dead <sup>30</sup> boughs which we go and cut, here and there, out of the copse-wood, to make a quick and bright fire when we get home,—this little taste of the woodman's calling which brings us closer to Nature and makes us think of M. Féli's eager fondness for the same work ; the hours of study and poetical flow which carry us to supper-time ; this meal, which summons us by the same gentle voice as its predecessor, and which is passed amid the same joys, only less loud, because evening sobers everything, tones everything down ; then our evening, ushered in by the blaze <sup>40</sup> of a cheerful fire, and which with its alternations of reading and talking brings us at last to bed-time:—to all the charms of a day so spent add the dreams which follow it, and your imagination will still fall far short of these home-joys in their delightful reality.'

I said the foregoing should be my last extract, but who could resist this picture of a January evening on the coast of Brittany?—

'All the sky is covered over with grey clouds just silvered at the edges. The sun, who departed a few minutes ago, 10 has left behind him enough light to temper for awhile the black shadows, and to soften down, as it were, the approach of night. The winds are hushed, and the tranquil ocean sends up to me, when I go out on the doorstep to listen, only a melodious murmur, which dies away in the soul like a beautiful wave on the beach. The birds, the first to obey the nocturnal influence, make their way towards the woods, and you hear the rustle of their wings in the clouds. The copses which cover the whole hill-side of Le Val, which all the day-time are alive with the chirp of the wren, the 20 laughing whistle of the woodpecker,<sup>1</sup> and the different notes of a multitude of birds, have no longer any sound in their paths and thickets, unless it be the prolonged high call of the blackbirds at play with one another and chasing one another, after all the other birds have their heads safe under their wings. The noise of man, always the last to be silent, dies gradually out over the face of the fields. The general murmur fades away, and one hears hardly a sound except what comes from the villages and hamlets, in which, up till far into the night, there are cries of 30 children and barking of dogs. Silence wraps me round; everything seeks repose except this pen of mine, which perhaps disturbs the rest of some living atom asleep in a crease of my note-book, for it makes its light scratching as it puts down these idle thoughts. Let it stop, then! for all I write, have written, or shall write, will never be worth setting against the sleep of an atom.'

On the 1st of February we find him in a lodging at Paris. 'I enter the world' (such are the last words written in his journal at Le Val) 'with a secret horror.' His outward history for the next five years is soon told. He found himself in Paris, poor, fastidious, and with health which already, no doubt, felt the obscure presence of the malady of which he died,—consumption. One of his Brittany acquaintances introduced him to editors, tried to engage him in the periodical literature of Paris; and so unmistakable was Guérin's talent, that even his first essays were immediately accepted. But Guérin's genius was of a kind which unfitted him to get his bread in this manner. At first he was pleased with the notion of living by his 10 pen; 'je n'ai qu'à écrire,' he says to his sister,—'I have only got to write.' But to a nature like his, endued with the passion for perfection, the necessity to produce, to produce constantly, to produce whether in the vein or out of the vein, to produce something good or bad or middling, as it may happen, but at all events something,—is the most intolerable of tortures. To escape from it he betook himself to that common but most perfidious refuge of men of letters, that refuge to which Goldsmith and poor Hartley Coleridge had betaken themselves before him,—the pro- 20 fession of teaching. In September, 1834, he procured an engagement at the Collège Stanislas, where he had himself been educated. It was vacation-time, and all he had to do was to teach a small class composed of boys who did not go home for the holidays,—in his own words, 'scholars left like sick sheep in the fold, while the rest of the flock are frisking in the fields.' After the vacation he was kept on at the College as a supernumerary. 'The master of the fifth class has asked for a month's leave of absence; I am taking his place, and by this work I get one hundred 30 francs (4*l.*). I have been looking about for pupils to give private lessons to, and I have found three or four. School-work and private lessons together fill my day from half-past seven in the morning till half-past nine at night. The college dinner serves me for breakfast, and I go and dine in the evening at twenty-four sous, as a young man beginning life should.' To better his position in the hierarchy of public teachers it was necessary that he should take the degree of agrégé ès-lettres, corresponding to our degree of Master of Arts; and to his heavy work in teach- 40 ing, there was thus added that of preparing for a severe examination. The drudgery of this life was very irksome to him, although less insupportable than the drudgery of the profession of letters ; inasmuch as to a sensitive man, like Guérin, to silence his genius is more tolerable than to hackney it. Still the yoke wore him deeply, and he had moments of bitter revolt : he continued, however, to bear it with resolution, and on the whole with patience, for four years. On the 15th of November, 1838, he married a young Creole lady of some fortune, Mademoiselle Caroline de Gervain, 'whom,' to use his own words, 'Destiny, who loves these surprises, has wafted from the farthest Indies into my arms.' The marriage was happy, and it ensured to Guérin liberty and leisure ; but now 'the blind Fury with the abhorred shears' was hard at hand. Consumption declared itself in him : 'I pass my life,' he writes, with his old playfulness and calm, to his sister, on the 8th of April, 1839, 'within my bed curtains, and wait patiently enough, thanks to Caro's<sup>1</sup> goodness, books, and dreams, for the recovery which the sunshine is to bring with it.' In search 20 of this sunshine he was taken to his native country, Languedoc, but in vain. He died at Le Cayla on the 19th of July, 1839.

<sup>1</sup> 'The woodpecker laughs,' says White of Selborne; and here is Guérin, in Brittany, confirming his testimony.

The vicissitudes of his inward life during these five years were more considerable. His opinions and tastes underwent great, or what seem to be great, changes. He came to Paris the ardent partisan of Lamennais : even in April, 1834, after Rome had finally condemned Lamennais, — 'To-night there will go forth from Paris,' he writes, 'with his face set to the west, a man whose every step 30 I would fain follow, and who returns to the desert for which I sigh. M. Féli departs this evening for La Chênaie.' But in October, 1835,— 'I assure you,' he writes to his sister, 'I am at last weaned from M. de Lamennais ; one does not remain a babe and suckling for ever ; I am perfectly freed from his influence.' There was a greater change than this. In 1834 the main cause of Guérin's aversion to the literature of the French romantic school, was that this literature, having had a religious origin had ceased to be religious : 'it has forgotten,' he says, 'the 40 house and the admonitions of its Father.' But his friend,

<sup>1</sup> His wife.

M. de Marzan, tells us of a 'deplorable revolution' which, by 1836, had taken place in him. Guérin had become intimate with the chiefs of this very literature; he no longer went to church; 'the bond of a common faith, in which our friendship had its birth, existed between us no longer.' Then, again, 'this interregnum was not destined to last.' Reconverted to his old faith by suffering and by the pious efforts of his sister Eugénie, Guérin died a Catholic. His feelings about society underwent a like change. After 'entering the world with a secret horror,'<sup>10</sup> after congratulating himself when he had been some months at Paris on being 'disengaged from the social tumult, out of the reach of those blows which, when I live in the thick of the world, bruise me, irritate me, or utterly crush me,' M. Sainte-Beuve tells us of him, two years afterwards, appearing in society 'a man of the world, elegant, even fashionable; a talker who could hold his own against the most brilliant talkers of Paris.'

In few natures, however, is there really such essential consistency as in Guérin's. He says of himself, in the<sup>20</sup> very beginning of his journal: 'I owe everything to poetry, for there is no other name to give to the sum total of my thoughts; I owe to it whatever I now have pure, lofty, and solid in my soul; I owe to it all my consolations in the past; I shall probably owe to it my future.' Poetry, the poetical instinct, was indeed the basis of his nature; but to say so thus absolutely is not quite enough. One aspect of poetry fascinated Guérin's imagination and held it prisoner. Poetry is the inter-<sup>30</sup>pretress of the natural world, and she is the interpretress of the moral world; it was as the interpretress of the natural world that she had Guérin for her mouthpiece. To make magically near and real the life of Nature, and man's life only so far as it is a part of that Nature, was his faculty; a faculty of naturalistic, not of moral interpretation. This faculty always has for its basis a peculiar temperament, an extraordinary delicacy of organisation and susceptibility to impressions; in exercising it the poet is in a great degree passive (Wordsworth thus speaks of a wise passiveness); he aspires to be a sort of human<sup>40</sup> Aeolian-harp, catching and rendering every rustle of Nature. To assist at the evolution of the whole life of the world is his craving, and intimately to feel it all :

... 'the glow, the thrill of life,
Where, where do these abound ?'

is what he asks : he resists being riveted and held stationary by any single impression, but would be borne on for ever down an enchanted stream. He goes into religion and out of religion, into society and out of society, not from the motives which impel men in general, but to feel what it 10 is all like ; he is thus hardly a moral agent, and, like the passive and ineffectual Uranus of Keats's poem, he may say :

... 'I am but a voice ;
My life is but the life of winds and tides ;
No more than winds and tides can I avail.'

He hovers over the tumult of life, but does not really put his hand to it.

No one has expressed the aspirations of this temperament better than Guérin himself. In the last year of his life he writes :—

20 'I return, as you see, to my old brooding over the world of Nature, that line which my thoughts irresistibly take ; a sort of passion which gives me enthusiasm, tears, bursts of joy, and an eternal food for musing ; and yet I am neither philosopher, nor naturalist, nor anything learned whatsoever. There is one word which is the God of my imagination, the tyrant, I ought rather to say, that fascinates it, lures it onward, gives it work to do without ceasing, and will finally carry it I know not where ; the word life.'

30 And in one place in his journal he says :—

'My imagination welcomes every dream, every impression, without attaching itself to any, and goes on for ever seeking something new.'

And again, in another :—

'The longer I live, and the clearer I discern between true and false in society, the more does the inclination to live, not as a savage or a misanthrope, but as a solitary man on the frontiers of society, on the outskirts of the world, gain strength and grow in me. The birds come 40 and go and make nests around our habitations, they are fellow-citizens of our farms and hamlets with us ; but they take their flight in a heaven which is boundless, but the hand of God alone gives and measures to them their daily food, but they build their nests in the heart of the thick bushes, or hang them in the height of the trees. So would I, too, live, hovering round society, and having always at my back a field of liberty vast as the sky.'

In the same spirit he longed for travel. 'When one is a wanderer,' he writes to his sister, 'one feels that one fulfils the true condition of humanity.' And the last entry <sup>10</sup> in his journal is—'The stream of travel is full of delight. Oh, who will set me adrift on this Nile !'

Assuredly it is not in this temperament that the active virtues have their rise. On the contrary, this temperament, considered in itself alone, indisposes for the discharge of them. Something morbid and excessive, as manifested in Guérin, it undoubtedly has. In him, as in Keats, and as in another youth of genius, whose name, but the other day unheard of, Lord Houghton has so gracefully written in the history of English poetry,—David Gray,—<sup>20</sup> the temperament, the talent itself, is deeply influenced by their mysterious malady ; the temperament is devouring ; it uses vital power too hard and too fast, paying the penalty in long hours of unutterable exhaustion and in premature death. The intensity of Guérin's depression is described to us by Guérin himself with the same incomparable touch with which he describes happier feelings ; far oftener than any pleasurable sense of his gift he has 'the sense profound, near, immense, of my misery, of my inward poverty.' And again : 'My inward misery gains <sup>30</sup> upon me ; I no longer dare look within.' And on another day of gloom he does look within, and here is the terrible analysis :—

'Craving, unquiet, seeing only by glimpses, my spirit is stricken by all those ills which are the sure fruit of a youth doomed never to ripen into manhood. I grow old and wear myself out in the most futile mental strainings, and make no progress. My head seems dying, and when the wind blows I fancy I feel it, as if I were a tree, blowing through a number of withered branches in my top. Study <sup>40</sup> is intolerable to me, or rather it is quite out of my power.

Mental work brings on, not drowsiness, but an irritable and nervous disgust which drives me out, I know not where, into the streets and public places. The Spring, whose delights used to come every year stealthily and mysteriously to charm me in my retreat, crushes me this year under a weight of sudden hotness. I should be glad of any event which delivered me from the situation in which I am. If I were free I would embark for some distant country where I could begin life anew.'

- 10 Such is this temperament in the frequent hours when the sense of its own weakness and isolation crushes it to the ground. Certainly it was not for Guérin's happiness, or for Keats's, as men count happiness, to be as they were. Still the very excess and predominance of their temperament has given to the fruits of their genius a unique brilliancy and flavour. I have said that poetry interprets in two ways; it interprets by expressing with magical felicity the physiognomy and movement of the outward world, and it interprets by expressing, with inspired 20 conviction, the ideas and laws of the inward world of man's moral and spiritual nature. In other words, poetry is interpretative both by having natural magic in it, and by having moral profundity. In both ways it illuminates man; it gives him a satisfying sense of reality; it reconciles him with himself and the universe. Thus Aeschylus's 'δράσαντι παθεῖν' and his 'ἀνήριθμον γέλασμα' are alike interpretative. Shakspeare interprets both when he says,

'Full many a glorious morning have I seen,
Flatter the mountain-tops with sovran eye;'

- 30 and when he says,

'There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them as we will.'

These great poets unite in themselves the faculty of both kinds of interpretation, the naturalistic and the moral. But it is observable that in the poets who unite both kinds, the latter (the moral) usually ends by making itself the master. In Shakspeare the two kinds seem wonderfully to balance one another; but even in him the balance leans; his expression tends to become too little sensuous 40 and simple, too much intellectualised. The same thing

may be yet more strongly affirmed of Lucretius and of Wordsworth. In Shelley there is not a balance of the two gifts, nor even a co-existence of them, but there is a passionate straining after them both, and this is what makes Shelley, as a man, so interesting: I will not now inquire how much Shelley achieves as a poet, but whatever he achieves, he in general fails to achieve natural magic in his expression; in Mr. Palgrave's charming Treasury may be seen a gallery of his failures.<sup>1</sup> But in Keats and Guérin, in whom the faculty of naturalistic interpretation <sup>10</sup> is overpoweringly predominant, the natural magic is perfect; when they speak of the world they speak like Adam naming by divine inspiration the creatures; their expression corresponds with the thing's essential reality. Even between Keats and Guérin, however, there is a distinction to be drawn. Keats has, above all, a sense of what is pleasureable and open in the life of Nature; for him she is the Alma Parens: his expression has, therefore, more than Guérin's, something genial, outward, and sensuous. Guérin has above all a sense of what there is adorable and secret in <sup>20</sup> the life of Nature; for him she is the Magna Parens; his expression has, therefore, more than Keats's, something mystic, inward, and profound.

So he lived like a man possessed; with his eye not on his own career, not on the public, not on fame, but on the Isis whose veil he had uplifted. He published nothing: 'There is more power and beauty,' he writes, 'in the well-kept secret of one's-self and one's thoughts, than in the display of a whole heaven that one may have inside one.' 'My spirit,' he answers the friends who urge him to write, <sup>30</sup> 'is of the home-keeping order, and has no fancy for adventure; literary adventure is above all distasteful to it; for this, indeed (let me say so without the least self-sufficiency), <sup>1</sup> Compare, for example, his 'Lines Written in the Euganean Hills,' with Keats's 'Ode to Autumn' (Golden Treasury, pp. 256, 284). The latter piece renders Nature; the former tries to render her. I will not deny, however, that Shelley has natural magic in his rhythm; what I deny is, that he has it in his language. It always seems to me that the right sphere for Shelley's genius was the sphere of music, not of poetry; the medium of sounds he can master, but to master the more difficult medium of words he has neither intellectual force enough nor sanity enough.

it has a contempt. The literary career seems to me unreal, both in its own essence and in the rewards which one seeks from it, and therefore fatally marred by a secret absurdity.' His acquaintances, and among them distinguished men of letters, full of admiration for the originality and delicacy of his talent, laughed at his self-depreciation, warmly assured him of his powers. He received their assurances with a mournful incredulity, which contrasts curiously with the self-assertion of poor David Gray, whom I just 10 now mentioned. 'It seems to me intolerable,' he writes, 'to appear to men other than one appears to God. My worst torture at this moment is the over-estimate which generous friends form of me. We are told that at the last judgment the secret of all consciences will be laid bare to the universe; would that mine were so this day, and that every passer-by could see me as I am!' 'High above my head,' he says at another time, 'far, far away, I seem to hear the murmur of that world of thought and feeling to which I aspire so often, but where I can never attain. I
 20 think of those of my own age who have wings strong enough to reach it, but I think of them without jealousy, and as men on earth contemplate the elect and their felicity.' And, criticising his own composition, 'When I begin a subject, my self-conceit' (says this exquisite artist) 'imagines I am doing wonders; and when I have finished, I see nothing but a wretched made-up imitation, composed of odds and ends of colour stolen from other people's palettes, and tastelessly mixed together on mine.' Such was his 30 passion for perfection, his disdain for all poetical work not perfectly adequate and felicitous. The magic of expression to which by the force of this passion he won his way, will make the name of Maurice de Guérin remembered in literature.

I have already mentioned the Centaur, a sort of prose poem by Guérin, which Madame Sand published after his death. The idea of this composition came to him, M. Sainte-Beuve says, in the course of some visits which he made with his friend, M. Trebutien, a learned antiquarian, to the Museum of Antiquities in the Louvre. The free and 40 wild life which the Greeks expressed by such creations as the Centaur had, as we might well expect, a strong charm for him; under the same inspiration he composed a

Bacchante, which was meant by him to form part of a prose poem on the adventures of Bacchus in India. Real as was the affinity which Guérin's nature had for these subjects, I doubt whether, in treating them, he would have found the full and final employment of his talent. But the beauty of his Centaur is extraordinary; in its whole conception and expression this piece has in a wonderful degree that natural magic of which I have said so much, and the rhythm has a charm which bewitches even a foreigner. An old Centaur on his mountain is supposed to relate<sup>10</sup> to Melampus, a human questioner, the life of his youth. Untranslatable as the piece is, I shall conclude with some extracts from it:—

'THE CENTAUR.

'I had my birth in the caves of these mountains. Like the stream of this valley, whose first drops trickle from some weeping rock in a deep cavern, the first moment of my life fell in the darkness of a remote abode, and without breaking the silence. When our mothers draw near to the time of their delivery, they withdraw to the caverns, and<sup>20</sup> in the depth of the loneliest of them, in the thickest of its gloom, bring forth, without uttering a plaint, a fruit silent as themselves. Their puissant milk makes us surmount, without weakness or dubious struggle, the first difficulties of life; and yet we leave our caverns later than you your cradles. The reason is that we have a doctrine that the early days of existence should be kept apart and enshrouded, as days filled with the presence of the gods. Nearly the whole term of my growth was passed in the darkness where I was born. The recesses of my dwelling ran so far<sup>30</sup> under the mountain, that I should not have known on which side was the exit, had not the winds, when they sometimes made their way through the opening, sent fresh airs in, and a sudden trouble. Sometimes, too, my mother came back to me, having about her the odours of the valleys, or streaming from the waters which were her haunt. Her returning thus, without a word said of the valleys or the rivers, but with the emanations from them hanging about her, troubled my spirit, and I moved up and down restlessly in my darkness. "What is it," I cried, "this outside world whither my mother is borne, and what reigns there in it so potent as to attract her so often?" At these moments my own force began to make me unquiet. I felt in it a power which could not remain idle; and betaking myself either to toss my arms or to gallop backwards and forwards in the spacious darkness of the cavern, I tried to make out from the blows which I dealt in the empty space, or from the transport of my course through it, in what 10 direction my arms were meant to reach, or my feet to bear me. Since that day, I have wound my arms round the bust of Centaurs, and round the body of heroes, and round the trunk of oaks; my hands have assayed the rocks, the waters, plants without number, and the subtlest impressions of the air,—for I uplift them in the dark and still nights to catch the breaths of wind, and to draw signs whereby I may augur my road; my feet,—look, O Melampus, how worn they are! And yet, all benumbed as I am in this extremity of age, there are days when, in broad 20 sunlight, on the mountain-tops, I renew these gallopings of my youth in the cavern, and with the same object, brandishing my arms and employing all the fleetness which yet is left to me.

‘O Melampus, thou who wouldst know the life of the Centaurs, wherefore have the gods willed that thy steps should lead thee to me, the oldest and most forlorn of them all? It is long since I have ceased to practise any part of their life. I quit no more this mountain summit, to which age has confined me. The point of my arrows now 20 serves me only to uproot some tough-fibred plant; the tranquil lakes know me still, but the rivers have forgotten me. I will tell thee a little of my youth; but these recollections, issuing from a worn memory, come like the drops of a niggardly libation poured from a damaged urn.

“The course of my youth was rapid and full of agitation. Movement was my life, and my steps knew no bound. One day when I was following the course of a valley seldom entered by the Centaurs, I discovered a man making his way up the stream-side on the opposite bank.
 40 He was the first whom my eyes had lighted on: I despised him. "Behold," I cried, "at the utmost but the half of what I am! How short are his steps! and his movement how full of labour! Doubtless he is a Centaur overthrown by the gods, and reduced by them to drag himself along thus."

'Wandering along at my own will like the rivers, feeling wherever I went the presence of Cybele, whether in the bed of the valleys, or on the height of the mountains, I bounded whither I would, like a blind and chainless life. But when Night, filled with the charm of the gods, overtook me on the slopes of the mountain, she guided me to the mouth of 10 the caverns, and there tranquillised me as she tranquillises the billows of the sea. Stretched across the threshold of my retreat, my flanks hidden within the cave, and my head under the open sky, I watched the spectacle of the dark. The sea-gods, it is said, quit during the hours of darkness their palaces under the deep; they seat themselves on the promontories, and their eyes wander over the expanse of the waves. Even so I kept watch, having at my feet an expanse of life like the hushed sea. My regards had free range, and travelled to the most distant points. Like 20 sea-beaches which never lose their wetness, the line of mountains to the west retained the imprint of gleams not perfectly wiped out by the shadows. In that quarter still survived, in pale clearness, mountain-summits naked and pure. There I beheld at one time the god Pan descend, ever solitary; at another, the choir of the mystic divinities; or I saw pass some mountain-nymph charm-struck by the night. Sometimes the eagles of Mount Olympus traversed the upper sky, and were lost to view among the far-off constellations, or in the shade of the dreaming forests. 30

'Thou pursuest after wisdom, O Melampus, which is the science of the will of the gods; and thou roamest from people to people like a mortal driven by the destinies. In the times when I kept my night-watches before the caverns, I have sometimes believed that I was about to surprise the thought of the sleeping Cybele, and that the mother of the gods, betrayed by her dreams, would let fall some of her secrets; but I have never made out more than sounds which faded away in the murmur of night, or words inarticulate as the bubbling of the rivers. 40

“ O Macareus,” one day said the great Chiron to me, whose old age I tended ; “ we are, both of us, Centaurs of the mountain ; but how different are our lives ! Of my days all the study is (thou seest it) the search for plants ; thou, thou art like those mortals who have picked up on the waters or in the woods, and carried to their lips, some pieces of the reed-pipe thrown away by the god Pan. From that hour these mortals, having caught from their relics of the god a passion for wild life, or perhaps 10 smitten with some secret madness, enter into the wilderness, plunge among the forests, follow the course of the streams, bury themselves in the heart of the mountains, restless, and haunted by an unknown purpose. The mares beloved of the winds in the farthest Scythia are not wilder than thou, nor more cast down at nightfall, when the North Wind has departed. Seekest thou to know the gods, O Macareus, and from what source men, animals, and the elements of the universal fire have their origin ? But the aged Ocean, the father of all things, keeps locked within his own breast
 20 these secrets ; and the nymphs, who stand around, sing as they weave their eternal dance before him, to cover any sound which might escape from his lips half-opened by slumber. The mortals, dear to the gods for their virtue, have received from their hands lyres to give delight to man, or the seeds of new plants to make him rich ; but from their inexorable lips, nothing ! ”

‘ Such were the lessons which the old Chiron gave me. Waned to the very extremity of life, the Centaur yet nourished in his spirit the most lofty discourse.

30 ‘ For me, O Melampus, I decline into my last days, calm as the setting of the constellations. I still retain enterprise enough to climb to the top of the rocks, and there I linger late, either gazing on the wild and restless clouds, or to see come up from the horizon the rainy Hyades, the Pleiades, or the great Orion ; but I feel myself perishing and passing quickly away, like a snow-wreath floating on the stream ; and soon I shall be mingled with the waters which flow in the vast bosom of Earth.’

EUGÉNIE DE GUÉRIN

WHO that had spoken of Maurice de Guérin could refrain from speaking of his sister Eugénie, the most devoted of sisters, one of the rarest and most beautiful of souls? 'There is nothing fixed, no duration, no vitality in the sentiments of women towards one another; their attachments are mere pretty bows of ribbon, and no more. In all the friendships of women I observe this slightness of the tie. I know no instance to the contrary, even in history. Orestes and Pylades have no sisters.' So she herself speaks of the friendships of her own sex. But 10 Electra can attach herself to Orestes, if not to Chrysothemis. And to her brother Maurice, Eugénie de Guérin was Pylades and Electra in one.

The name of Maurice de Guérin,—that young man so gifted, so attractive, so careless of fame, and so early snatched away; who died at twenty-nine; who, says his sister, 'let what he did be lost with a carelessness so unjust to himself, set no value on any of his own productions, and departed hence without reaping the rich harvest which seemed his due;' who, in spite of his 20 immaturity, in spite of his fragility, exercised such a charm, 'furnished to others so much of that which all live by,' that some years after his death his sister found in a country-house where he used to stay, in the journal of a young girl who had not known him, but who heard her family speak of him, his name, the date of his death, and these words, 'il était leur vie' (he was their life); whose talent, exquisite as that of Keats, with less of sunlight, abundance, and facility in it than that of Keats, but with more of distinction and power, had 'that winning, delicate, and beautifully 30 happy turn of expression' which is the stamp of the master,—is beginning to be well known to all lovers of literature. This establishment of Maurice's name was an object for which his sister Eugénie passionately laboured. While he was alive, she placed her whole joy in the flowering of this gifted nature ; when he was dead, she had no other thought than to make the world know him as she knew him. She outlived him nine years, and her cherished task for those years was to rescue the fragments of her brother's composition, to collect them, to get them published. In pursuing this task she had at first cheering hopes of success ; she had at last baffling and bitter disappointment. Her earthly business was at an end ; she died. Ten years 10 afterwards, it was permitted to the love of a friend, M. Trebutien, to effect for Maurice's memory what the love of a sister had failed to accomplish. But those who read, with delight and admiration, the journal and letters of Maurice de Guérin, could not but be attracted and touched by this sister Eugénie, who met them at every page. She seemed hardly less gifted, hardly less interesting, than Maurice himself. And presently M. Trebutien did for the sister what he had done for the brother. He published the journal of Mdlle. Eugénie de Guérin, and a few (too few, 20 alas !) of her letters.<sup>1</sup> The book has made a profound impression in France ; and the fame which she sought only for her brother now crowns the sister also.

Parts of Mdlle. de Guérin's journal were several years ago printed for private circulation, and a writer in the National Review had the good fortune to fall in with them. The bees of our English criticism do not often roam so far afield for their honey, and this critic deserves thanks for having flitted in his quest of blossom to foreign parts, and for having settled upon a beautiful flower found 30 there. He had the discernment to see that Mdlle. de Guérin was well worth speaking of, and he spoke of her with feeling and appreciation. But that, as I have said, was several years ago ; even a true and feeling homage needs to be from time to time renewed, if the memory of its object is to endure ; and criticism must not lose the occasion offered by Mdlle. de Guérin's journal being for the first time published to the world, of directing notice once more to this religious and beautiful character.

Eugénie de Guérin was born in 1805, at the château

<sup>1</sup> A volume of these, also, has just been brought out by M. Trebutien. One good book, at least, in the literature of the year 1865 !

of Le Cayla, in Languedoc. Her family, though reduced in circumstances, was noble ; and even when one is a saint one cannot quite forget that one comes of the stock of the Guarini of Italy, or that one counts among one's ancestors a Bishop of Senlis, who had the marshalling of the French order of battle on the day of Bouvines. Le Cayla was a solitary place, with its terrace looking down upon a stream-bed and valley ; ' one may pass days there without seeing any living thing but the sheep, without hearing any living thing but the birds.' M. de Guérin, Eugénie's father, <sup>10</sup> lost his wife when Eugénie was thirteen years old, and Maurice seven ; he was left with four children,—Eugénie, Marie, Erembert, and Maurice,—of whom Eugénie was the eldest, and Maurice was the youngest. This youngest child, whose beauty and delicacy had made him the object of his mother's most anxious fondness, was commended by her in dying to the care of his sister Eugénie. Maurice at eleven years old went to school at Toulouse ; then he went to the Collège Stanislas at Paris ; then he became a member of the religious society which M. de Lamennais had formed <sup>20</sup> at La Chênaie in Brittany ; afterwards he lived chiefly at Paris, returning to Le Cayla, at the age of twenty-nine, to die. Distance, in those days, was a great obstacle to frequent meetings of the separated members of a French family of narrow means. Maurice de Guérin was seldom at Le Cayla after he had once quitted it, though his few visits to his home were long ones ; but he passed five years,—the period of his sojourn in Brittany, and of his first settlement in Paris,—without coming home at all. In spite of the check from these absences, in spite of the <sup>30</sup> more serious check from a temporary alteration in Maurice's religious feelings, the union between the brother and sister was wonderfully close and firm. For they were knit together, not only by the tie of blood and early attachment, but also by the tie of a common genius. ' We were,' says Eugénie, ' two eyes looking out of one head.' She, on her part, brought to her love for her brother the devotedness of a woman, the intensity of a recluse, almost the solicitude of a mother. Her home duties prevented her from following the wish, which often arose in her, to join a religious <sup>40</sup> sisterhood. There is a trace,—just a trace,—of an early attachment to a cousin ; but he died when she was twenty-four. After that, she lived for Maurice. It was for Maurice that, in addition to her constant correspondence with him by letter, she began in 1834 her journal, which was sent to him by portions as it was finished. After his death she tried to continue it, addressing it 'to Maurice in Heaven.' But the effort was beyond her strength ; gradually the entries become rarer and rarer ; and on the last day of December, 1840, the pen dropped from her hand : the 10 journal ends.

Other sisters have loved their brothers, and it is not her affection for Maurice, admirable as this was, which alone could have made Eugénie de Guérin celebrated. I have said that both brother and sister had genius : M. Sainte-Beuve goes so far as to say that the sister's genius was equal, if not superior, to her brother's. No one has a more profound respect for M. Sainte-Beuve's critical judgments than I have ; but it seems to me that this particular judgment needs to be a little explained
20 and guarded. In Maurice's special talent, which was a talent for interpreting nature, for finding words which incomparably render the subtlest impressions which nature makes upon us, which bring the intimate life of nature wonderfully near to us, it seems to me that his sister was by no means his equal. She never, indeed, expresses herself without grace and intelligence ; but her words, when she speaks of the life and appearances of nature, are in general but intellectual signs ; they are not like her brother's—symbols equivalent with the thing
30 symbolised. They bring the notion of the thing described to the mind, they do not bring the feeling of it to the imagination. Writing from the Nivernais, that region of vast woodlands in the centre of France : 'It does one good,' says Eugénie, 'to be going about in the midst of this enchanting nature, with flowers, birds, and verdure all round one, under this large and blue sky of the Nivernais. How I love the gracious form of it, and those little white clouds here and there, like cushions of cotton, hung aloft to rest the eye in this immensity !' It is pretty and graceful, 40 but how different from the grave and pregnant strokes of Maurice's pencil ! 'I have been along the Loire, and seen on its banks the plains where nature is puissant and gay ; I have seen royal and antique dwellings, all marked by memories which have their place in the mournful legend of humanity,—Chambord, Blois, Amboise, Chenonceaux ; then the towns on the two banks of the river,—Orleans, Tours, Saumur, Nantes ; and, at the end of it all, the Ocean rumbling. From these I passed back into the interior of the country, as far as Bourges and Nevers, a region of vast woodlands, in which murmurs of an immense range and fulness ' (ce beau torrent de rumeurs, as, with an expres-<sup>10</sup> sion worthy of Wordsworth, he elsewhere calls them) ' prevail and never cease.' Words whose charm is like that of the sounds of the murmuring forest itself, and whose reverberations, like theirs, die away in the infinite distance of the soul.

Maurice's life was in the life of nature, and the passion for it consumed him ; it would have been strange if his accent had not caught more of the soul of nature than Eugénie's accent, whose life was elsewhere. ' You will find in him,' Maurice says to his sister of a friend whom<sup>20</sup> he was recommending to her, ' you will find in him that which you love, and which suits you better than anything else,—l'onction, l'effusion, la mysticité.' Unction, the pouring out of the soul, the rapture of the mystic, were dear to Maurice also ; but in him the bent of his genius gave even to those a special direction of its own. In Eugénie they took the direction most native and familiar to them ; their object was the religious life.

And yet, if one analyses this beautiful and most interesting character quite to the bottom, it is not exactly as a saint<sup>30</sup> that Eugénie de Guérin is remarkable. The ideal saint is a nature like Saint François de Sales or Fénelon ; a nature of ineffable sweetness and serenity, a nature in which struggle and revolt is over, and the whole man (so far as is possible to human infirmity) swallowed up in love. Saint Theresa (it is Mdlle. de Guérin herself who reminds us of it) endured twenty years of unacceptance and of repulse in her prayers ; yes, but the Saint Theresa whom Christendom knows is Saint Theresa repulsed no longer ! it is Saint Theresa accepted, rejoicing in love, radiant<sup>40</sup> with ecstasy. Mdlle. de Guérin is not one of these saints arrived at perfect sweetness and calm, steeped in ecstasy ; there is something primitive, indomitable in her, which she governs, indeed, but which chafes, which revolts ; somewhere in the depths of that strong nature there is a struggle, an impatience, an inquietude, an ennui, which endures to the end, and which leaves one, when one finally closes her journal, with an impression of profound melancholy. ‘ There are days,’ she writes to her brother, ‘ when one’s nature rolls itself up, and becomes a hedgehog. If 10 I had you here at this moment, here close by me, how I should prick you ! how sharp and hard ! ’ ‘ Poor soul, poor soul,’ she cries out to herself another day, ‘ what is the matter, what would you have ? Where is that which will do you good ? Everything is green, everything is in bloom, all the air has a breath of flowers. How beautiful it is ! well, I will go out. No, I should be alone, and all this beauty, when one is alone, is worth nothing. What shall I do then ? Read, write, pray, take a basket of sand on my head like that hermit-saint, and walk with it ? Yes,

 20 work, work ! keep busy the body which does mischief to the soul ! I have been too little occupied to-day, and that is bad for one, and it gives a certain ennui which I have in me time to ferment.’

A certain ennui which I have in me : her wound is there. In vain she follows the counsel of Fénelon : ‘ If God tires you, tell him that he tires you.’ No doubt she obtained great and frequent solace and restoration from prayer : ‘ This morning I was suffering ; well, at present I am calm, and this I owe to faith, simply to faith, to an act of faith. I 30 can think of death and eternity without trouble, without alarm. Over a deep of sorrow there floats a divine calm, a suavity which is the work of God only. In vain have I tried other things at a time like this : nothing human comforts the soul, nothing human upholds it :—

“ A l’enfant il faut sa mère,
 A mon âme il faut mon Dieu.”

Still the ennui reappears, bringing with it hours of unutterable forlornness, and making her cling to her one great earthly happiness,—her affection for her brother,— 40 with an intensesness, an anxiety, a desperation in which there is something morbid, and by which she is occasionally carried into an irritability, a jealousy, which she herself is the first, indeed, to censure, which she severely represses, but which nevertheless leaves a sense of pain.

ARNOLD

H

Mdlle. de Guérin's admirers have compared her to Pascal, and in some respects the comparison is just. But she cannot exactly be classed with Pascal, any more than with Saint François de Sales. Pascal is a man, and the inexhaustible power and activity of his mind leave him no leisure for ennui. He has not the sweetness and 10 serenity of the perfect saint; he is, perhaps, 'der strenge, kranke Pascal—the severe, morbid Pascal,'—as Goethe (and, strange to say, Goethe at twenty-three, an age which usually feels Pascal's charm most profoundly) calls him; but the stress and movement of the lifelong conflict waged in him between his soul and his reason keep him full of fire, full of agitation, and keep his reader, who witnesses this conflict, animated and excited; the sense of forlornness and dejected weariness which clings to Eugénie de Guérin does not belong to Pascal. Eugénie 20 de Guérin is a woman, and longs for a state of firm happiness, for an affection in which she may repose; the inward bliss of Saint Theresa or Fénelon would have satisfied her; denied this, she cannot rest satisfied with the triumphs of self-abasement, with the sombre joy of trampling the pride of life and of reason underfoot, of reducing all human hope and joy to insignificance; she repeats the magnificent words of Bossuet, words which both Catholicism and Protestantism have uttered with indefatigable iteration: 'On trouve au fond de tout le vide et le néant—at the bottom 30 of everything one finds emptiness and nothingness,'—but she feels, as every one but the true mystic must ever feel, their incurable sterility.

She resembles Pascal, however, by the clearness and firmness of her intelligence, going straight and instinctively to the bottom of any matter she is dealing with, and expressing herself about it with incomparable precision; never fumbling with what she has to say, never imperfectly seizing or imperfectly presenting her thought. And to this admirable precision she joins a lightness of touch, 40 a feminine ease and grace, a flowing facility which are her own. 'I do not say,' writes her brother Maurice, an excellent judge, 'that I find in myself a dearth of expression; but I have not this abundance of yours, this productiveness of soul which streams forth, which courses along without ever failing, and always with an infinite charm.' And writing to her of some composition of hers, produced after her religious scruples had for a long time kept her from the exercise of her talent: 'You see, my dear Tortoise,' he writes, 'that your talent is no illusion, since after a period, 10 I know not how long, of poetical inaction,—a trial to which any half-talent would have succumbed,—it rears its head again more vigorous than ever. It is really heart-breaking to see you repress and bind down, with I know not what scruples, your spirit, which tends with all the force of its nature to develop itself in this direction. Others have made it a case of conscience for you to resist this impulse, and I make it one for you to follow it.' And she says of herself, on one of her freer days: 'It is the instinct of my life to write, as it is the instinct of the fountain to 20 flow.' The charm of her expression is not a sensuous and imaginative charm like that of Maurice, but rather an intellectual charm; it comes from the texture of the style rather than from its elements; it is not so much in the words as in the turn of the phrase, in the happy cast and flow of the sentence. Recluse as she was, she had a great correspondence: every one wished to have letters from her; and no wonder.

To this strength of intelligence and talent of expression she joined a great force of character. Religion had early

30 possessed itself of this force of character, and reinforced it: in the shadow of the Cevennes, in the sharp and tonic nature of this region of southern France, which has seen the Albigenians, which has seen the Camisards, Catholicism too is fervent and intense. Eugénie de Guérin was brought up amidst strong religious influences, and they found in her a nature on which they could lay firm hold. I have said that she was not a saint of the order of Saint François de Sales or Fénelon; perhaps she had too keen an intelligence to suffer her to be this, too forcible and impetuous

40 a character. But I did not mean to imply the least doubt of the reality, the profoundness, of her religious life. She was penetrated by the power of religion ; religion was the master-influence of her life ; she derived immense consolations from religion, she earnestly strove to conform her whole nature to it ; if there was an element in her which religion could not perfectly reach, perfectly transmute, she groaned over this element in her, she chid it, she made it bow. Almost every thought in her was brought into harmony with religion ; and what few thoughts were not thus brought into harmony were brought into subjection.

10

Then she had her affection for her brother ; and this, too, though perhaps there might be in it something a little over-eager, a little too absolute, a little too susceptible, was a pure, a devoted affection. It was not only passionate, it was tender. It was tender, pliant, and self-sacrificing to a degree that not in one nature out of a thousand,—of natures with a mind and will like hers,—is found attainable. She thus united extraordinary power of intelligence, extraordinary force of character, and extraordinary strength of affection ; and all these under the control of a deep religious 20 feeling.

This is what makes her so remarkable, so interesting. I shall try and make her speak for herself, that she may show us the characteristic sides of her rare nature with her own inimitable touch.

It must be remembered that her journal is written for Maurice only ; in her lifetime no eye but his ever saw it. 'Ceci n'est pas pour le public,' she writes ; 'c'est de l'intime, c'est de l'âme, c'est pour un.' 'This is not for the public ; it contains my inmost thoughts, my very soul ; it is for 30 one.' And Maurice, this one, was a kind of second self to her. 'We see things with the same eyes ; what you find beautiful, I find beautiful ; God has made our souls of one piece.' And this genuine confidence in her brother's sympathy gives to the entries in her journal a naturalness and simple freedom rare in such compositions. She felt that he would understand her, and be interested in all that she wrote.

One of the first pages of her journal relates an incident of the home-life of Le Cayla, the smallest detail of which 40 Maurice liked to hear ; and in relating it she brings this simple life before us. She is writing in November, 1834 :—

‘I am furious with the grey cat. The mischievous beast has made away with a little half-frozen pigeon, which I was trying to thaw by the side of the fire. The poor little thing was just beginning to come round ; I meant to tame him ; he would have grown fond of me ; and there is my whole scheme eaten up by a cat ! This event, and all the rest of to-day’s history, has passed in the kitchen. Here I take up my abode all the morning
 10 and a part of the evening, ever since I am without Mimi.<sup>1</sup> I have to superintend the cook ; sometimes papa comes down, and I read to him by the oven, or by the fireside, some bits out of the Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church. This book struck Pierril<sup>2</sup> with astonishment. “Que de mouts aqui dédins ! What a lot of words there are inside it !” This boy is a real original. One evening he asked me if the soul was immortal ; then afterwards, what a philosopher was ? We had got upon great questions, as you see. When I told him that a philosopher was a 20 person who was wise and learned : “Then, mademoiselle, you are a philosopher.” This was said with an air of simplicity and sincerity which might have made even Socrates take it as a compliment ; but it made me laugh so much that my gravity as catechist was gone for that evening. A day or two ago Pierril left us, to his great sorrow : his time with us was up on Saint Brice’s day. Now he goes about with his little dog, truffle-hunting. If he comes this way I shall go and ask him if he still thinks I look like a philosopher.’

30 Her good sense and spirit made her discharge with alacrity her household tasks in this patriarchal life of Le Cayla, and treat them as the most natural thing in the world. She sometimes complains, to be sure, of burning her fingers at the kitchen-fire. But when a literary friend of her brother expresses enthusiasm about her and her poetical nature : ‘The poetess,’ she says, ‘whom this gentleman believes me to be, is an ideal being, infinitely removed from the life which is actually mine—a life of occupations, a life of household-business, which takes up all my time. How could I make it otherwise? I am sure I do not know; and, besides, my duty is in this sort of life, and I have no wish to escape from it.'

<sup>1</sup> The familiar name of her sister Marie.

<sup>2</sup> A servant-boy at Le Cayla.

Among these occupations of the patriarchal life of the châtelaine of Le Cayla intercourse with the poor fills a prominent place:—

'To-day,' she writes on the 9th of December, 1834, 'I have been warming myself at every fireside in the village. It is a round which Mimi and I often make, and in which I take pleasure. To-day we have been seeing sick 10 people, and holding forth on doses and sick-room drinks. "Take this, do that;" and they attend to us just as if we were the doctor. We prescribed shoes for a little thing who was amiss from having gone barefoot; to the brother, who, with a bad headache, was lying quite flat, we prescribed a pillow; the pillow did him good, but I am afraid it will hardly cure him. He is at the beginning of a bad feverish cold: and these poor people live in the filth of their hovels like animals in their stable; the bad air poisons them. When I come home to Le Cayla I seem to be in a palace.' 20

She had books, too; not in abundance, not for the fancying them; the list of her library is small, and it is enlarged slowly and with difficulty. The Letters of Saint Theresa, which she had long wished to get, she sees in the hands of a poor servant-girl, before she can procure them for herself. 'What then?' is her comment: 'very likely she makes a better use of them than I could.' But she has the Imitation, the Spiritual Works of Bossuet and Fénelon, the Lives of the Saints, Corneille, Racine, André Chénier, and Lamartine; Madame de Staël's book on 30 Germany, and French translations of Shakspeare's plays, Ossian, the Vicar of Wakefield, Scott's Old Mortality and Redgauntlet, and the Promessi Sposi of Manzoni. Above all, she has her own mind; her meditations in the lonely fields, on the oak-grown hill-side of 'The Seven Springs;' her meditations and writing in her own room, her chambrette, her délicieux chez moi, where every night, before she goes to bed, she opens the window to look out upon the sky,—the balmy moonlit sky of Languedoc. This life of reading, thinking, and writing was the life she liked best, the life 40 that most truly suited her. 'I find writing has become almost a necessity to me. Whence does it arise, this impulse to give utterance to the voice of one's spirit, to pour out my thoughts before God and one human being? I say one human being, because I always imagine that you are present, that you see what I write. In the stillness of a life like this my spirit is happy, and, as it were, dead to all that goes on upstairs or downstairs, in the house or out of the house. But this does not last long. "Come, my poor spirit," I then say to myself, "we must go back 10 to the things of this world." And I take my spinning, or a book, or a saucepan, or I play with Wolf or Trilby. Such a life as this I call heaven upon earth.'

Tastes like these, joined with a talent like Mdlle. de Guérin's, naturally inspire thoughts of literary composition. Such thoughts she had, and perhaps she would have been happier if she had followed them; but she never could satisfy herself that to follow them was quite consistent with the religious life, and her projects of composition were gradually relinquished:—

20 'Would to God that my thoughts, my spirit, had never taken their flight beyond the narrow round in which it is my lot to live! In spite of all that people say to the contrary, I feel that I cannot go beyond my needlework and my spinning without going too far: I feel it, I believe it: well, then, I will keep in my proper sphere; however much I am tempted, my spirit shall not be allowed to occupy itself with great matters until it occupies itself with them in Heaven.'

And again:—

30 'My journal has been untouched for a long while. Do you want to know why? It is because the time seems to me misspent which I spend in writing it. We owe God an account of every minute; and is it not a wrong use of our minutes to employ them in writing a history of our transitory days?'

She overcomes her scruples, and goes on writing the journal; but again and again they return to her. Her brother tells her of the pleasure and comfort something she has written gives to a friend of his in affliction. She

40 answers:—

'It is from the Cross that those thoughts come, which your friend finds so soothing, so unspeakably tender. None of them come from me. I feel my own aridity ; but I feel, too, that God, when he will, can make an ocean flow upon this bed of sand. It is the same with so many simple souls, from which proceed the most admirable things ; because they are in direct relation with God, without false science and without pride. And thus I am gradually losing my taste for books ; I say to myself : " What can they teach me which I shall not one day know in Heaven ? let God be my master and my study here ! " I try to make 10 him so, and I find myself the better for it. I read little ; I go out little ; I plunge myself in the inward life. How infinite are the sayings, doings, feelings, events of that life ! Oh, if you could but see them ! But what avails it to make them known ? God alone should be admitted to the sanctuary of the soul.'

Beautifully as she says all this, one cannot, I think, read it without a sense of disquietude, without a presentiment that this ardent spirit is forcing itself from its natural bent, that the beatitude of the true mystic will 20 never be its earthly portion. And yet how simple and charming is her picture of the life of religion which she chose as her ark of refuge, and in which she desired to place all her happiness :—

' Cloaks, clogs, umbrellas, all the apparatus of winter, went with us this morning to Andillac, where we have passed the whole day ; some of it at the curé's house, the rest in church. How I like this life of a country Sunday, with its activity, its journeys to church, its liveliness ! You find all your neighbours on the road ; you 30 have a curtsey from every woman you meet, and then, as you go along, such a talk about the poultry, the sheep and cows, the good man and the children ! My great delight is to give a kiss to these children, and see them run away and hide their blushing faces in their mother's gown. They are alarmed at las doumaïsélos,<sup>1</sup> as at a being of another world. One of these little things said the other day to its grandmother, who was talking of coming to see us : " Minino, you mustn't go to that castle ; there is a black hole there." What is the reason that in all ages 40 the noble's château has been an object of terror? Is it because of the horrors that were committed there in old times? I suppose so.'

<sup>1</sup> The young lady.

This vague horror of the château, still lingering in the mind of the French peasant fifty years after he has stormed it, is indeed curious, and is one of the thousand indications how unlike aristocracy on the Continent has been to aristocracy in England. But this is one of the great matters with which Mdlle. de Guérin would not have us occupied ;
 10 let us pass to the subject of Christmas in Languedoc :—

'Christmas is come ; the beautiful festival, the one I love most, and which gives me the same joy as it gave the shepherds of Bethlehem. In real truth, one's whole soul sings with joy at this beautiful coming of God upon earth,—a coming which here is announced on all sides of us by music and by our charming nadalet.<sup>1</sup> Nothing at Paris can give you a notion of what Christmas is with us. You have not even the midnight-mass. We all of us went to it, papa at our head, on the most perfect night 20 possible. Never was there a finer sky than ours was that midnight ;—so fine that papa kept perpetually throwing back the hood of his cloak, that he might look up at the sky. The ground was white with hoar-frost, but we were not cold ; besides, the air, as we met it, was warmed by the bundles of blazing torchwood which our servants carried in front of us to light us on our way. It was delightful, I do assure you ; and I should like you to have seen us there on our road to church, in those lanes with the bushes along their banks as white as if they were 30 in flower. The hoar-frost makes the most lovely flowers. We saw a long spray so beautiful that we wanted to take it with us as a garland for the communion-table, but it melted in our hands : all flowers fade so soon ! I was very sorry about my garland ; it was mournful to see it drip away, and get smaller and smaller every minute.'

The religious life is at bottom everywhere alike ; but it is curious to note the variousness of its setting and outward circumstance. Catholicism has these so different from Protestantism ! and in Catholicism these accessories have, it cannot be denied, a nobleness and amplitude which in Protestantism is often wanting to them. In Catholicism they have, from the antiquity of this form of religion, from its pretensions to universality, from its really wide-spread prevalence, from its sensuousness, something European, august, and imaginative : in Protestantism they often have, from its inferiority in all these respects, something provincial, mean, and prosaic. In revenge, Protestantism has a future before it, a prospect of growth in alliance with the vital movement of modern society ; 10 while Catholicism appears to be bent on widening the breach between itself and the modern spirit, to be fatally losing itself in the multiplication of dogmas, Mariolatry, and miracle-mongering. But the style and circumstance of actual Catholicism is grander than its present tendency, and the style and circumstance of Protestantism is meaner than its tendency. While I was reading the journal of Mdlle. de Guérin, there came into my hands the memoir and poems of a young Englishwoman, Miss Emma Tatham ; and one could not but be struck with the singular contrast 20 which the two lives,—in their setting rather than in their inherent quality,—present. Miss Tatham had not, certainly, Mdlle. de Guérin's talent, but she had a sincere vein of poetic feeling, a genuine aptitude for composition. Both were fervent Christians, and, so far, the two lives have a real resemblance ; but, in the setting of them, what a difference ! The Frenchwoman is a Catholic in Languedoc ; the Englishwoman is a Protestant at Margate ; Margate, that brick-and-mortar image of English Protestantism, representing it in all its prose, all its uncomeli- 30 ness,—let me add, all its salubrity. Between the external form and fashion of these two lives, between the Catholic Mdlle. de Guérin's nadalet at the Languedoc Christmas, her chapel of moss at Easter-time, her daily reading of the life of a saint, carrying her to the most diverse times, places, and peoples,—her quoting, when she wants to fix her mind upon the stanchness which the religious aspirant needs, the words of Saint Macedonius to a hunter whom he met in the mountains, ' I pursue after God, as you pursue after game,'—her quoting, when she wants to break 40 a village girl of disobedience to her mother, the story of the ten disobedient children whom at Hippo Saint Augustine saw palsied ;—between all this and the bare, blank, narrowly English setting of Miss Tatham's Protestantism, her 'union in church-fellowship with the worshippers at Hawley-Square Chapel, Margate ;' her 'singing with soft, sweet voice, the animating lines—

<sup>1</sup> A peculiar peal rung at Christmas-time by the church bells of Languedoc.

“ My Jesus to know, and feel his blood flow,
'Tis life everlasting, 'tis heaven below ;”

her 'young female teachers belonging to the Sunday-school,' and her 'Mr. Thomas Rowe, a venerable class-leader,'—what a dissimilarity ! In the ground of the two lives, a likeness ; in all their circumstance, what unlikeness ! An unlikeness, it will be said, in that which is non-essential and indifferent. Non-essential,—yes ; indifferent,—no. The signal want of grace and charm in English Protestantism's setting of its religious life is not an indifferent matter ; it is a real weakness. This ought ye to have done, and not to have left the other undone.

I have said that the present tendency of Catholicism, —the Catholicism of the main body of the Catholic clergy and laity,—seems likely to exaggerate rather than to remove all that in this form of religion is most repugnant to reason ; but this Catholicism was not that of Mdlle. de Guérin. The insufficiency of her Catholicism comes from a doctrine which Protestantism, too, has adopted, although Protestantism, from its inherent element of freedom, may find it easier to escape from it ; a doctrine with a certain attraction for all noble natures, but, in the modern world at any rate, incurably sterile,—the doctrine of the emptiness and nothingness of human life, of the superiority of renouncement to activity, of quietism to energy ; the doctrine which makes effort for things on this side of the grave a folly, and joy in things on this side of the grave a sin. But her Catholicism is remarkably free from the faults which Protestants commonly think inseparable from Catholicism ; the relation to the priest, the practice of confession, assume, when she speaks of them, an aspect which is not that under which Exeter Hall knows them, but which,—unless one is of the number of those who 40 prefer regarding that by which men and nations die to regarding that by which they live,—one is glad to study. ‘La confession,’ she says twice in her journal, ‘n’est qu’une expansion du repentir dans l’amour ;’ and her weekly journey to the confessional in the little church of Cahuzac is her ‘cher pèlerinage ;’ the little church is the place where she has ‘laissé tant de misères.’

‘This morning,’ she writes, one 28th of November, ‘I was up before daylight, dressed quickly, said my prayers, and started with Marie for Cahuzac. When we got there, the chapel was occupied, which I was not sorry for. I like <sup>10</sup> not to be hurried, and to have time, before I go in, to lay bare my soul before God. This often takes me a long time, because my thoughts are apt to be flying about like these autumn leaves. At ten o’clock I was on my knees, listening to words the most salutary that were ever spoken ; and I went away, feeling myself a better being. Every burden thrown off leaves us with a sense of brightness ; and when the soul has laid down the load of its sins at God’s feet, it feels as if it had wings. What an admirable thing is confession ! What comfort, what light, what strength is <sup>20</sup> given me every time after I have said, I have sinned.’

This blessing of confession is the greater, she says, ‘the more the heart of the priest to whom we confide our repentance is like that divine heart which “has so loved us.” This is what attaches me to M. Bories.’ M. Bories was the curé of her parish, a man no longer young, and of whose loss, when he was about to leave them, she thus speaks :—

‘What a grief for me ! how much I lose in losing this faithful guide of my conscience, heart, and mind, of my whole self, which God has appointed to be in his charge, <sup>30</sup> and which let itself be in his charge so gladly ! He knew the resolves which God had put in my heart, and I had need of his help to follow them. Our new curé cannot supply his place : he is so young ! and then he seems so inexperienced, so undecided ! It needs firmness to pluck a soul out of the midst of the world, and to uphold it against the assaults of flesh and blood. It is Saturday, my day for going to Cahuzac ; I am just going there, perhaps I shall come back more tranquil. God has always given me some good thing there, in that chapel where I have left behind me so many <sup>40</sup> miseries.’

Such is confession for her when the priest is worthy ; and, when he is not worthy, she knows how to separate the man from the office :—

‘To-day I am going to do something which I dislike ; but I will do it, with God’s help. Do not think I am on my way to the stake ; it is only that I am going to confess to a priest in whom I have not confidence, but who is the only one here. In this act of religion the man must always be separated from the priest, and sometimes the man
10 must be annihilated.’

The same clear sense, the same freedom from superstition, shows itself in all her religious life. She tells us, to be sure, how once, when she was a little girl, she stained a new frock, and on praying, in her alarm, to an image of the Virgin which hung in her room, saw the stains vanish : even the austerest Protestant will not judge such Mariolatry as this very harshly. But, in general, the Virgin Mary fills, in the religious parts of her journal, no prominent place ; it is Jesus, not Mary. ‘Oh, how well has 20 Jesus said : “Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden.” It is only there, only in the bosom of God, that we can rightly weep, rightly rid ourselves of our burden.’ And again : ‘The mystery of suffering makes one grasp the belief of something to be expiated, something to be won. I see it in Jesus Christ, the Man of Sorrow. It was necessary that the Son of Man should suffer. That is all we know in the troubles and calamities of life.’

And who has ever spoken of justification more impressively and piously than Mdlle. de Guérin speaks of it, when, 30 after reckoning the number of minutes she has lived, she exclaims :—

‘My God, what have we done with all these minutes of ours, which thou, too, wilt one day reckon ? Will there be any of them to count for eternal life ? will there be many of them ? will there be one of them ? “If thou, O Lord, wilt be extreme to mark what is done amiss, O Lord, who may abide it ?” This close scrutiny of our time may well make us tremble, all of us who have advanced 40 more than a few steps in life ; for God will judge us otherwise than as he judges the lilies of the field. I have never been able to understand the security of those who place their whole reliance, in presenting themselves before God, upon a good conduct in the ordinary relations of human life. As if all our duties were confined within the narrow sphere of this world! To be a good parent, a good child, a good citizen, a good brother or sister, is not enough to procure entrance into the kingdom of heaven. God demands other things besides these kindly social virtues, of him whom he means to crown with an eternity of glory.'

And, with this zeal for the spirit and power of religion, 10 what prudence in her counsels of religious practice; what discernment, what measure! She has been speaking of the charm of the Lives of the Saints, and she goes on:—

'Notwithstanding this, the Lives of the Saints seem to me, for a great many people, dangerous reading. I would not recommend them to a young girl, or even to some women who are no longer young. What one reads has such power over one's feelings; and these, even in seeking God, sometimes go astray. Alas, we have seen it in poor C.'s case. What care one ought to take with a young 20 person; with what she reads, what she writes, her society, her prayers,—all of them matters which demand a mother's tender watchfulness! I remember many things I did at fourteen, which my mother, had she lived, would not have let me do. I would have done anything for God's sake; I would have cast myself into an oven, and assuredly things like that are not God's will; he is not pleased by the hurt one does to one's health through that ardent but ill-regulated piety which, while it impairs the body, often leaves many a fault flourishing. And, therefore, Saint 30 François de Sales used to say to the nuns who asked his leave to go barefoot: "Change your brains and keep your shoes."'

Meanwhile Maurice, in a five years' absence, and amid the distractions of Paris, lost, or seemed to his sister to lose, something of his fondness for his home and its inmates; he certainly lost his early religious habits and feelings. It is on this latter loss that Mdlle. de Guérin's journal oftenest touches,—with infinite delicacy, but with infinite anguish:—

'Oh, the agony of being in fear for a soul's salvation, 40

who can describe it! That which caused our Saviour the keenest suffering, in the agony of his Passion, was not so much the thought of the torments he was to endure, as the thought that these torments would be of no avail for a multitude of sinners; for all those who set themselves against their redemption, or who do not care for it. The mere anticipation of this obstinacy and this heedlessness had power to make sorrowful, even unto death, the divine Son of Man. And this feeling all Christian souls, according to the measure of faith and love granted them, more or less share.'

Maurice returned to Le Cayla in the summer of 1837, and passed six months there. This meeting entirely restored the union between him and his family. 'These six months with us,' writes his sister, 'he ill, and finding himself so loved by us all, had entirely reattached him to us. Five years without seeing us, had perhaps made him a little lose sight of our affection for him; having found it again, he met it with all the strength of his own. He had so firmly renewed, before he left us, all family-ties, that nothing but death could have broken them.' The separation in religious matters between the brother and sister gradually diminished, and before Maurice died it had ceased. I have elsewhere spoken of Maurice's religious feeling and its character. It is probable that his divergence from his sister in this sphere of religion was never so wide as she feared, and that his reunion with her was never so complete as she hoped. 'His errors were passed,' she says, 'his illusions were cleared away; by the call of his nature, by original disposition, he had come back to sentiments of order. I knew all, I followed each of his steps; out of the fiery sphere of the passions (which held him but a little moment) I saw him pass into the sphere of the Christian life. It was a beautiful soul, the soul of Maurice.' But the illness which had caused his return to Le Cayla reappeared after he got back to Paris in the winter of 1837-8. Again he seemed to recover; and his marriage with a young Creole lady, Mdlle. Caroline de Gervain, took place in the autumn of 1838. At the end of September in that year Mdlle. de Guérin had joined her brother in Paris; she was present at his marriage, and stayed with him and his wife for some months afterwards. Her journal recommences in April 1839; zealously as she had promoted her brother's marriage, cordial as were her relations with her sister-in-law, it is evident that a sense of loss, of loneliness, invades her, and sometimes weighs her down. She writes in her journal on the 4th of May:—

'God knows when we shall see one another again! My own Maurice, must it be our lot to live apart, to find that this marriage, which I had so much share in bringing<sup>10</sup> about, which I hoped would keep us so much together, leaves us more asunder than ever? For the present and for the future, this troubles me more than I can say. My sympathies, my inclinations, carry me more towards you than towards any other member of our family. I have the misfortune to be fonder of you than of anything else in the world, and my heart had from of old built in you its happiness. Youth gone and life declining, I looked forward to quitting the scene with Maurice. At any time of life a great affection is a great happiness; the spirit<sup>20</sup> comes to take refuge in it entirely. O delight and joy which will never be your sister's portion! Only in the direction of God shall I find an issue for my heart to love as it has the notion of loving, as it has the power of loving.'

From such complainings, in which there is undoubtedly something morbid,—complainings which she herself blamed, to which she seldom gave way, but which, in presenting her character, it is not just to put wholly out of sight,—she was called by the news of an alarming return of her brother's illness. For some days the entries in the journal<sup>30</sup> show her agony of apprehension. 'He coughs, he coughs still! Those words keep echoing for ever in my ears, and pursue me wherever I go; I cannot look at the leaves on the trees without thinking that the winter will come, and then the consumptive die.' Then she went to him and brought him back by slow stages to Le Cayla, dying. He died on the 19th of July, 1839.

Thenceforward the energy of life ebbed in her; but the main chords of her being, the chord of affection, the chord of religious longing, the chord of intelligence, the chord of<sup>40</sup> sorrow, gave, so long as they answered to the touch at all, a deeper and finer sound than ever. Always she saw before her, 'that beloved pale face;' 'that beautiful head, with all its different expressions, smiling, speaking, suffering, dying,' regarded her always:—

'I have seen his coffin in the same room, in the same spot where I remember seeing, when I was a very little girl, his cradle, when I was brought home from Gaillac, where I was then staying, for his christening. This christening was a grand one, full of rejoicing, more than that of 10 any of the rest of us; specially marked. I enjoyed myself greatly, and went back to Gaillac next day, charmed with my new little brother. Two years afterwards I came home, and brought with me for him a frock of my own making. I dressed him in the frock, and took him out with me along by the warren at the north of the house, and there he walked a few steps alone,—his first walking alone,—and I ran with delight to tell my mother the news: "Maurice, Maurice has begun to walk by himself!"—Recollections which, coming back to day, break one's 20 heart!'

The shortness and suffering of her brother's life filled her with an agony of pity. 'Poor beloved soul, you have had hardly any happiness here below; your life has been so short, your repose so rare. O God, uphold me, stablish my heart in thy faith! Alas, I have too little of this supporting me! How we have gazed at him and loved him, and kissed him,—his wife, and we, his sisters; he lying lifeless in his bed, his head on the pillow as if he were asleep! Then we followed him to the churchyard, 30 to the grave, to his last resting-place, and prayed over him, and wept over him; and we are here again, and I am writing to him again, as if he were staying away from home, as if he were in Paris. My beloved one, can it be, shall we never see one another again on earth?'

But in heaven?—and here, though love and hope finally prevailed, the very passion of the sister's longing sometimes inspired torturing inquietudes:—

'I am broken down with misery. I want to see him. Every moment I pray to God to grant me this grace.
40 Heaven, the world of spirits, is it so far from us? O depth, O mystery of the other life which separates us! I, who was so eagerly anxious about him, who wanted so to know all that happened to him,—wherever he may be now, it is over! I follow him into the three abodes: I stop wistfully before the place of bliss; I pass on to the place of suffering;—to the gulf of fire. My God, my God, no! Not there let my brother be! not there! And he is not: his soul, the soul of Maurice, among the lost . . . horrible fear, no! But in purgatory, where the soul is cleansed by suffering, where the failings of the heart are expiated, the doubtings of the spirit, the half-yieldings to evil? 10 Perhaps my brother is there and suffers, and calls to us amidst his anguish of repentance, as he used to call to us amidst his bodily suffering: "Help me, you who love me." Yes, beloved one, by prayer. I will go and pray; prayer has been such a power to me, and I will pray to the end. Prayer! Oh! and prayer for the dead; it is the dew of purgatory.'

ARNOLD

I

Often, alas, the gracious dew would not fall; the air of her soul was parched; the arid wind, which was somewhere in the depths of her being, blew. She marks in her 20 journal the first of May, 'this return of the loveliest month in the year,' only to keep up the old habit; even the month of May can no longer give her any pleasure: 'Tout est changé—all is changed.' She is crushed by 'the misery which has nothing good in it, the tearless, dry misery, which bruises the heart like a hammer.'

'I am dying to everything. I am dying of a slow moral agony, a condition of unutterable suffering. Lie there, my poor journal! be forgotten with all this world which is fading away from me. I will write here no more until 30 I come to life again, until God re-awakens me out of this tomb in which my soul lies buried. Maurice, my beloved! it was not thus with me when I had you! The thought of Maurice could revive me from the most profound depression: to have him in the world was enough for me. With Maurice, to be buried alive would have not seemed dull to me.'

And, as a burden to this funereal strain, the old vide et néant of Bossuet, profound, solemn, sterile:—

'So beautiful in the morning, and in the evening, that! 40 how the thought disenchant one, and turns one from the world ! I can understand that Spanish grandee who, after lifting up the winding-sheet of a beautiful queen, threw himself into a cloister and became a great saint. I would have all my friends at La Trappe, in the interest of their eternal welfare. Not that in the world one cannot be saved, not that there are not in the world duties to be discharged as sacred and as beautiful as there are in the cloister, but . . .'

And there she stops, and a day or two afterwards her 10 journal comes to an end. A few fragments, a few letters carry us on a little later, but after the 22nd of August, 1845, there is nothing. To make known her brother's genius to the world was the one task she set herself after his death ; in 1840 came Madame Sand's noble tribute to him in the Revue des Deux Mondes ; then followed projects of raising a yet more enduring monument to his fame, by collecting and publishing his scattered compositions ; these projects I have already said, were baffled ;—Mdlle. de Guérin's
 20 letter of the 22nd of August, 1845, relates to this disappointment. In silence, during nearly three years more, she faded away at Le Cayla. She died on the 31st of May, 1848.

M. Trebutien has accomplished the pious task in which Mdlle. de Guérin was baffled, and has established Maurice's fame ; by publishing this journal he has established Eugénie's also. She was very different from her brother ; but she too, like him, had that in her which preserves a reputation. Her soul had the same characteristic quality as his talent,—distinction. Of this quality the world is 30 impatient ; it chafes against it, rails at it, insults it, hates it : it ends by receiving its influence, and by undergoing its law. This quality at last inexorably corrects the world's blunders, and fixes the world's ideals. It procures that the popular poet shall not finally pass for a Pindar, nor the popular historian for a Tacitus, nor the popular preacher for a Bossuet. To the circle of spirits marked by this rare quality, Maurice and Eugénie de Guérin belong ; they will take their place in the sky which these inhabit, and shine close to one another, lucida sidera.

HEINRICH HEINE

'I KNOW not if I deserve that a laurel-wreath should one day be laid on my coffin. Poetry, dearly as I have loved it, has always been to me but a divine plaything. I have never attached any great value to poetical fame; and I trouble myself very little whether people praise my verses or blame them. But lay on my coffin a sword; for I was a brave soldier in the war of liberation of humanity.'

Heine had his full share of love of fame, and cared quite as much as his brethren of the genus irritabile whether people praised his verses or blamed them. And he was 10 very little of a hero. Posterity will certainly decorate his tomb with the emblem of the laurel rather than with the emblem of the sword. Still, for his contemporaries, for us, for the Europe of the present century, he is significant chiefly for the reason which he himself in the words just quoted assigns. He is significant because he was, if not pre-eminently a brave, yet a brilliant, a most effective soldier in the war of liberation of humanity.

To ascertain the master-current in the literature of an epoch, and to distinguish this from all minor currents, is 20 one of the critic's highest functions; in discharging it he shows how far he possesses the most indispensable quality of his office,—justness of spirit. The living writer who has done most to make England acquainted with German authors, a man of genius, but to whom precisely this one quality of justness of spirit is perhaps wanting,—I mean Mr. Carlyle,—seems to me in the result of his labours on German literature to afford a proof how very necessary to the critic this quality is. Mr. Carlyle has spoken admirably of Goethe; but then Goethe stands before all men's eyes, 30 the manifest centre of German literature; and from this central source many rivers flow. Which of these rivers is the main stream? which of the courses of spirit which we see active in Goethe is the course which will most influence the future, and attract and be continued by the most powerful of Goethe's successors?—that is the question. Mr. Carlyle attaches, it seems to me, far too much importance to the romantic school of Germany,—Tieck, Novalis, Jean Paul Richter,—and gives to these writers, really gifted as two, at any rate, of them are, an undue prominence. These writers, and others with aims and a general tendency the same as theirs, are not the real inheritors and continuators of Goethe's power; the current of their activity is not the main current of German literature after 10 Goethe. Far more in Heine's works flows this main current; Heine, far more than Tieck or Jean Paul Richter, is the continuator of that which, in Goethe's varied activity, is the most powerful and vital; on Heine, of all German authors who survived Goethe, incomparably the largest portion of Goethe's mantle fell. I do not forget that when Mr. Carlyle was dealing with German literature, Heine, though he was clearly risen above the horizon, had not shone forth with all his strength; I do not forget, too, that after ten or twenty years many things may come out

 20 plain before the critic which before were hard to be discerned by him; and assuredly no one would dream of imputing it as a fault to Mr. Carlyle that twenty years ago he mistook the central current in German literature, overlooked the rising Heine, and attached undue importance to that romantic school which Heine was to destroy; one may rather note it as a misfortune, sent perhaps as a delicate chastisement to a critic, who,—man of genius as he is, and no one recognises his genius more admiringly than I do,—has, for the functions of the critic, a little too 30 much of the self-will and eccentricity of a genuine son of Great Britain.

Heine is noteworthy, because he is the most important German successor and continuator of Goethe in Goethe's most important line of activity. And which of Goethe's lines of activity is this?—His line of activity as 'a soldier in the war of liberation of humanity.'

Heine himself would hardly have admitted this affiliation, though he was far too powerful-minded a man to decry, with some of the vulgar German liberals, Goethe's 40 genius. 'The wind of the Paris Revolution,' he writes after the three days of 1830, 'blew about the candles a little in the dark night of Germany, so that the red curtains of a German throne or two caught fire ; but the old watchmen, who do the police of the German kingdoms, are already bringing out the fire-engines, and will keep the candles closer snuffed for the future. Poor, fast-bound German people, lose not all heart in thy bonds ! The fashionable coating of ice melts off from my heart, my soul quivers and my eyes burn, and that is a disadvantageous state of things for a writer, who should control his subject-matter and keep himself beautifully objective, as the 10 artistic school would have us, and as Goethe has done ; he has come to be eighty years old doing this, and minister, and in good condition ;—poor German people ! that is thy greatest man ! ’

But hear Goethe himself : ‘ If I were to say what I had really been to the Germans in general, and to the young German poets in particular, I should say I had been their liberator. ’

Modern times find themselves with an immense system of institutions, established facts, accredited dogmas, cus- 20 toms, rules, which have come to them from times not modern. In this system their life has to be carried forward ; yet they have a sense that this system is not of their own creation, that it by no means corresponds exactly with the wants of their actual life, that, for them, it is customary, not rational. The awakening of this sense is the awakening of the modern spirit. The modern spirit is now awake almost everywhere ; the sense of want of correspondence between the forms of modern Europe and its spirit, between the new wine of the eighteenth and 30 nineteenth centuries, and the old bottles of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, or even of the sixteenth and seventeenth, almost every one now perceives ; it is no longer dangerous to affirm that this want of correspondence exists ; people are even beginning to be shy of denying it. To remove this want of correspondence is beginning to be the settled endeavour of most persons of good sense. Dissolvents of the old European system of dominant ideas and facts we must all be, all of us who have any power of working ; what we have to study is that we may not be 40 acrid dissolvents of it.

And how did Goethe, that grand dissolvent in an age when there were fewer of them than at present, proceed in his task of dissolution, of liberation of the modern European from the old routine? He shall tell us himself. 'Through me the German poets have become aware that, as man must live from within outwards, so the artist must work from within outwards, seeing that, make what contortions he will, he can only bring to light his own individuality. I can clearly mark where this influence of mine has 10 made itself felt; there arises out of it a kind of poetry of nature, and only in this way is it possible to be original.'

My voice shall never be joined to those which decry Goethe, and if it is said that the foregoing is a lame and impotent conclusion to Goethe's declaration that he had been the liberator of the Germans in general, and of the young German poets in particular, I say it is not. Goethe's profound, imperturbable naturalism is absolutely fatal to all routine thinking; he puts the standard, once for all, inside every man instead of outside him; when he is told,
20 such a thing must be so, there is immense authority and custom in favour of its being so, it has been held to be so for a thousand years, he answers with Olympian politeness, 'But is it so? is it so to me?' Nothing could be more really subversive of the foundations on which the old European order rested; and it may be remarked that no persons are so radically detached from this order, no persons so thoroughly modern, as those who have felt Goethe's influence most deeply. If it is said that Goethe professes to have in this way deeply influenced but a few
30 persons, and those persons poets, one may answer that he could have taken no better way to secure, in the end, the ear of the world; for poetry is simply the most beautiful, impressive, and widely effective mode of saying things, and hence its importance. Nevertheless the process of liberation, as Goethe worked it, though sure, is undoubtedly slow; he came, as Heine says, to be eighty years old in thus working it, and at the end of that time the old Middle-Age machine was still creaking on, the thirty German courts and their chamberlains subsisted in all their glory;
40 Goethe himself was a minister, and the visible triumph of the modern spirit over prescription and routine seemed as far off as ever. It was the year 1830; the German sovereigns had passed the preceding fifteen years in breaking the promises of freedom they had made to their subjects when they wanted their help in the final struggle with Napoleon. Great events were happening in France; the revolution, defeated in 1815, had arisen from its defeat, and was wresting from its adversaries the power. Heinrich Heine, a young man of genius, born at Hamburg, and with all the culture of Germany, but by race a Jew; with warm sympathies for France, whose revolution had given to its 10 race the rights of citizenship, and whose rule had been, as is well known, popular in the Rhine provinces, where he passed his youth; with a passionate admiration for the great French Emperor, with a passionate contempt for the sovereigns who had overthrown him, for their agents, and for their policy,—Heinrich Heine was in 1830 in no humour for any such gradual process of liberation from the old order of things as that which Goethe had followed. His counsel was for open war. With that terrible modern 20 weapon, the pen, in his hand, he passed the remainder of his life in one fierce battle. What was that battle? the reader will ask. It was a life and death battle with Philistinism.

Philistinism!—we have not the expression in English. Perhaps we have not the word because we have so much of the thing. At Soli, I imagine, they did not talk of solecisms; and here, at the very head-quarters of Goliath, nobody talks of Philistinism. The French have adopted the term épicier (grocer), to designate the sort of being whom the Germans designate by the term Philistine; but 30 the French term,—besides that it casts a slur upon a respectable class, composed of living and susceptible members, while the original Philistines are dead and buried long ago,—is really, I think, in itself much less apt and expressive than the German term. Efforts have been made to obtain in English some term equivalent to Philister or épicier; Mr. Carlyle has made several such efforts: ‘respectability with its thousand gigs,’ he says;—well, the occupant of every one of these gigs is, Mr. Carlyle means, a Philistine. However, the word respectable is far too valuable a word 40 to be thus perverted from its proper meaning; if the English are ever to have a word for the thing we are speaking of,—and so prodigious are the changes which the modern spirit is introducing, that even we English shall perhaps one day come to want such a word,—I think we had much better take the term Philistine itself.

Philistine must have originally meant, in the mind of those who invented the nickname, a strong, dogged, unenlightened opponent of the chosen people, of the children of the light. The party of change, the would-be remodellers 10 of the old traditional European order, the invokers of reason against custom, the representatives of the modern spirit in every sphere where it is applicable, regarded themselves, with the robust self-confidence natural to reformers as a chosen people, as children of the light. They regarded their adversaries as humdrum people, slaves to routine, enemies to light; stupid and oppressive, but at the same time very strong. This explains the love which Heine, that Paladin of the modern spirit, has for France; it explains the preference which he gives to France over 20 Germany: 'the French,' he says, 'are the chosen people of the new religion, its first gospels and dogmas have been drawn up in their language; Paris is the new Jerusalem, and the Rhine is the Jordan which divides the consecrated land of freedom from the land of the Philistines.' He means that the French, as a people, have shown more accessibility to ideas than any other people; that prescription and routine have had less hold upon them than upon any other people; that they have shown most readiness to move and to alter at the bidding (real or supposed) of 30 reason. This explains, too, the detestation which Heine had for the English: 'I might settle in England,' he says, in his exile, 'if it were not that I should find there two things, coal-smoke and Englishmen; I cannot abide either.' What he hated in the English was the 'ächt-brittische Beschränktheit,' as he calls it,—the genuine British narrowness. In truth, the English, profoundly as they have modified the old Middle-Age order, great as is the liberty which they have secured for themselves, have in all their changes proceeded, to use a familiar expression, 40 by the rule of thumb; what was intolerably inconvenient to them they have suppressed, and as they have suppressed

it, not because it was irrational, but because it was practically inconvenient, they have seldom in suppressing it appealed to reason, but always, if possible, to some precedent, or form, or letter, which served as a convenient instrument for their purpose, and which saved them from the necessity of recurring to general principles. They have thus become, in a certain sense, of all people the most inaccessible to ideas and the most impatient of them; inaccessible to them, because of their want of familiarity with them; and impatient of them because they have got on so well without them, that they despise those who, not having got on as well as themselves, still make a fuss for what they themselves have done so well without. But there has certainly followed from hence, in this country, somewhat of a general depression of pure intelligence: Philistia has come to be thought by us the true Land of Promise, and it is anything but that; the born lover of ideas, the born hater of commonplaces, must feel in this country, that the sky over his head is of brass and iron. The enthusiast for the idea, for reason, values reason, the idea, in and for themselves; he values them, irrespectively of the practical conveniences which their triumph may obtain for him; and the man who regards the possession of these practical conveniences as something sufficient in itself, something which compensates for the absence or surrender of the idea, of reason, is, in his eyes, a Philistine. This is why Heine so often and so mercilessly attacks the liberals; much as he hates conservatism he hates Philistinism even more, and whoever attacks conservatism itself ignobly, not as a child of light, not in the name of the idea, is a Philistine. Our Cobbett is thus for him, much as he disliked our clergy and aristocracy whom Cobbett attacked, a Philistine with six fingers on every hand and on every foot six toes, four-and-twenty in number: a Philistine, the staff of whose spear is like a weaver's beam. Thus he speaks of him:—

‘ While I translate Cobbett's words, the man himself comes bodily before my mind's eye, as I saw him at that uproarious dinner at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, with his scolding red face and his radical laugh, in which venomous hate mingles with a mocking exultation at his enemies' surely approaching downfall. He is a chained cur, who falls with equal fury on every one whom he does not know, often bites the best friend of the house in his calves, barks incessantly, and just because of this incessantness of his barking cannot get listened to, even when he barks at a real thief. Therefore, the distinguished thieves who plunder England do not think it necessary to throw the growling Cobbett a bone to stop his mouth. This makes the dog furiously savage, and he shows all his 10 hungry teeth. Poor old Cobbett! England's dog! I have no love for thee, for every vulgar nature my soul abhors; but thou touchest me to the inmost soul with pity, as I see how thou strainest in vain to break loose and to get at those thieves, who make off with their booty before thy very eyes, and mock at thy fruitless springs and thine impotent howling.'

There is balm in Philistia as well as in Gilead. A chosen circle of children of the modern spirit, perfectly emancipated from prejudice and commonplace, regarding the 20 ideal side of things in all its efforts for change, passionately despising half-measures and condescension to human folly and obstinacy,—with a bewildered, timid, torpid multitude behind,—conducts a country to the ministry of Herr von Bismarck. A nation regarding the practical side of things in its efforts for change, attacking not what is irrational, but what is pressingly inconvenient, and attacking this as one body, 'moving altogether if it move at all,' and treating children of light like the very harshest of step-mothers, comes to the prosperity and liberty of modern England.
 30 For all that, however, Philistia (let me say it again) is not the true promised land, as we English commonly imagine it to be; and our excessive neglect of the idea, and consequent inaptitude for it, threatens us, at a moment when the idea is beginning to exercise a real power in human society, with serious future inconvenience, and, in the meanwhile, cuts us off from the sympathy of other nations, which feel its power more than we do.

But, in 1830, Heine very soon found that the fire-engines of the German governments were too much for his direct 40 efforts at incendiarism. 'What demon drove me,' he cries, 'to write my Reisebilder, to edit a newspaper, to plague myself with our time and its interests, to try and shake the poor German Hodge out of his thousand years' sleep in his hole? What good did I get by it? Hodge opened his eyes, only to shut them again immediately; he yawned, only to begin snoring again the next minute louder than ever; he stretched his stiff ungainly limbs, only to sink down again directly afterwards, and lie like a dead man in the old bed of his accustomed habits. I must have rest; but where am I to find a resting-place? In Germany I can no longer stay.'

10

This is Heine's jesting account of his own efforts to rouse Germany: now for his pathetic account of them; it is because he unites so much wit with so much pathos that he is so effective a writer:—

'The Emperor Charles the Fifth sate in sore straits, in the Tyrol, encompassed by his enemies. All his knights and courtiers had forsaken him; not one came to his help. I know not if he had at that time the cheese face with which Holbein has painted him for us. But I am sure that under-lip of his, with its contempt for mankind, stuck 20 out even more than it does in his portraits. How could he but contemn the tribe which in the sunshine of his prosperity had fawned on him so devotedly, and now, in his dark distress, left him all alone? Then suddenly his door opened, and there came in a man in disguise, and, as he threw back his cloak, the Kaiser recognised in him his faithful Conrad von der Rosen, the court jester. This man brought him comfort and counsel, and he was the court jester!

'O German fatherland! dear German people! I am 30 thy Conrad von der Rosen. The man whose proper business was to amuse thee, and who in good times should have catered only for thy mirth, makes his way into thy prison in time of need; here, under my cloak, I bring thee thy sceptre and crown; dost thou not recognise me, my Kaiser? If I cannot free thee, I will at least comfort thee, and thou shalt at least have one with thee who will prattle with thee about thy sorest affliction, and whisper courage to thee, and love thee, and whose best joke and best blood shall be at thy service. For thou, my people, 40 art the true Kaiser, the true lord of the land; thy will is sovereign, and more legitimate far than that purple Tel est notre plaisir, which invokes a divine right with no better warrant than the anointings of shaven and shorn jugglers; thy will, my people, is the sole rightful source of power. Though now thou liest down in thy bonds, yet in the end will thy rightful cause prevail; the day of deliverance is at hand, a new time is beginning. My Kaiser, the night is over, and out there glows the ruddy dawn.

10 ““ Conrad von der Rosen, my fool, thou art mistaken; perhaps thou takest a headsman’s gleaming axe for the sun, and the red of dawn is only blood.”

““ No, my Kaiser, it is the sun, though it is rising in the west; these six thousand years it has always risen in the east; it is high time there should come a change.”

““ Conrad von der Rosen, my fool, thou hast lost the bells out of thy red cap, and it has now such an odd look, that red cap of thine!”

20 ““ Ah, my Kaiser, thy distress has made me shake my head so hard and fierce, that the fool’s bells have dropped off my cap; the cap is none the worse for that.”

““ Conrad von der Rosen, my fool, what is that noise of breaking and cracking outside there?”

““ Hush! that is the saw and the carpenter’s axe, and soon the doors of thy prison will be burst open, and thou wilt be free, my Kaiser!”

““ Am I then really Kaiser? Ah, I forgot, it is the fool who tells me so!”

30 ““ Oh, sigh not, my dear master, the air of thy prison makes thee so desponding! when once thou hast got thy rights again, thou wilt feel once more the bold imperial blood in thy veins, and thou wilt be proud like a Kaiser, and violent, and gracious, and unjust, and smiling, and ungrateful, as princes are.”

““ Conrad von der Rosen, my fool, when I am free, what wilt thou do then?”

““ I will then sew new bells on to my cap.”

““ And how shall I recompense thy fidelity?”

““ Ah, dear master, by not leaving me to die in a ditch!””

40 I wish to mark Heine’s place in modern European literature, the scope of his activity, and his value. I cannot attempt to give here a detailed account of his life, or a description of his separate works. In May, 1831, he went over his Jordan, the Rhine, and fixed himself in his new Jerusalem, Paris. There, henceforward, he lived, going in general to some French watering-place in the summer, but making only one or two short visits to Germany during the rest of his life. His works, in verse and prose, succeeded each other without stopping; a collected edition of them, filling seven closely-printed octavo volumes, has been published in America; <sup>1</sup> in the collected editions <sup>10</sup> of few people's works is there so little to skip. Those who wish for a single good specimen of him should read his first important work, the work which made his reputation, the Reisebilder, or 'Travelling Sketches: ' prose and verse, wit and seriousness, are mingled in it, and the mingling of these is characteristic of Heine, and is nowhere to be seen practised more naturally and happily than in his Reisebilder. In 1847 his health, which till then had always been perfectly good, gave way. He had a kind of paralytic stroke. His malady proved to be a softening <sup>20</sup> of the spinal marrow: it was incurable; it made rapid progress. In May, 1848, not a year after his first attack, he went out of doors for the last time; but his disease took more than eight years to kill him. For nearly eight years he lay helpless on a couch, with the use of his limbs gone, wasted almost to the proportions of a child, wasted so that a woman could carry him about; the sight of one eye lost, that of the other greatly dimmed, and requiring, that it might be exercised, to have the palsied eyelid lifted and held up by the finger; all this, and suffering, besides <sup>30</sup> this, at short intervals, paroxysms of nervous agony. I have said he was not pre-eminently brave; but in the astonishing force of spirit with which he retained his activity of mind, even his gaiety, amid all his suffering, and went on composing with undiminished fire to the last, he was truly brave. Nothing could clog that aerial lightness. 'Pouvez-vous siffler?' his doctor asked him one day, when he was almost at his last gasp;—'siffler,' as every one knows, has the double meaning of to whistle and to hiss :—‘ Hélas ! non,’ was his whispered answer ; ‘ pas même une comédie de M. Scribe ! ’ M. Scribe is, or was, the favourite dramatist of the French Philistine. ‘ My nerves,’ he said to some one who asked him about them in 1855, the year of the Great Exhibition in Paris, ‘ my nerves are of that quite singularly remarkable miserableness of nature, that I am convinced they would get at the Exhibition the grand medal for pain and misery.’ He read all the medical books which treated of his com-

<sup>1</sup> A complete edition has at last appeared in Germany.

10 plaint. ‘ But,’ said he to some one who found him thus engaged, ‘ what good this reading is to do me I don’t know, except that it will qualify me to give lectures in heaven on the ignorance of doctors on earth about diseases of the spinal marrow.’ What a matter of grim seriousness are our own ailments to most of us ! yet with this gaiety Heine treated his to the end. That end, so long in coming, came at last. Heine died on the 17th of February, 1856, at the age of fifty-eight. By his will he forbade that his remains should be transported to Germany. He lies 20 buried in the cemetery of Montmartre, at Paris.

His direct political action was null, and this is neither to be wondered at nor regretted ; direct political action is not the true function of literature, and Heine was a born man of letters. Even in his favourite France the turn taken by public affairs was not at all what he wished, though he read French politics by no means as we in England, most of us, read them. He thought things were tending there to the triumph of communism ; and to a champion of the idea like Heine, what there is gross and narrow in 30 communism was very repulsive. ‘ It is all of no use,’ he cried on his death-bed, ‘ the future belongs to our enemies, the Communists, and Louis Napoleon is their John the Baptist.’ ‘ And yet,’—he added with all his old love for that remarkable entity, so full of attraction for him, so profoundly unknown in England, the French people,—‘ do not believe that God lets all this go forward merely as a grand comedy. Even though the Communists deny him to-day, he knows better than they do, that a time will come when they will learn to believe in him.’ After 1831
40 his hopes of soon upsetting the German Governments had died away, and his propagandism took another, a more truly literary, character. It took the character of an intrepid application of the modern spirit to literature. To the ideas with which the burning questions of modern life filled him, he made all his subject-matter minister. He touched all the great points in the career of the human race, and here he but followed the tendency of the wide culture of Germany; but he touched them with a wand which brought them all under a light where the modern eye cares most to see them, and here he gave a lesson to the culture of Germany,—so wide, so impartial, that it is <sup>10</sup> apt to become slack and powerless, and to lose itself in its materials for want of a strong central idea round which to group all its other ideas. So the mystic and romantic school of Germany lost itself in the Middle Ages, was overpowered by their influence, came to ruin by its vain dreams of renewing them. Heine, with a far profounder sense of the mystic and romantic charm of the Middle Age than Gœrres, or Brentano, or Arnim, Heine the chief romantic poet of Germany, is yet also much more than a romantic poet; he is a great modern poet, he is not <sup>20</sup> conquered by the Middle Age, he has a talisman by which he can feel,—along with but above the power of the fascinating Middle Age itself,—the power of modern ideas.

A French critic of Heine thinks he has said enough in saying that Heine proclaimed in German countries, with beat of drum, the ideas of 1789, and that at the cheerful noise of his drum the ghosts of the Middle Age took to flight. But this is rather too French an account of the matter. Germany, that vast mine of ideas, had <sup>30</sup> no need to import ideas, as such, from any foreign country; and if Heine had carried ideas, as such, from France into Germany, he would but have been carrying coals to Newcastle. But that for which France, far less meditative than Germany, is eminent, is the prompt, ardent, and practical application of an idea, when she seizes it, in all departments of human activity which admit it. And that in which Germany most fails, and by failing in which she appears so helpless and impotent, is just the practical application of her innumerable ideas. ‘When Candide,’ says Heine <sup>40</sup> himself, ‘came to Eldorado, he saw in the streets a number of boys who were playing with gold-nuggets instead of marbles. This degree of luxury made him imagine that they must be the king's children, and he was not a little astonished when he found that in Eldorado gold-nuggets are of no more value than marbles are with us, and that the schoolboys play with them. A similar thing happened to a friend of mine, a foreigner, when he came to Germany and first read German books. He was perfectly astounded at the wealth of ideas which he found in them ; but he soon 10 remarked that ideas in Germany are as plentiful as gold-nuggets in Eldorado, and that those writers whom he had taken for intellectual princes, were in reality only common school-boys.' Heine was, as he calls himself, a 'Child of the French Revolution,' an 'Initiator,' because he vigorously assured the Germans that ideas were not counters or marbles, to be played with for their own sake ; because he exhibited in literature modern ideas applied with the utmost freedom, clearness, and originality. And therefore he declared that the great task of his life had been the endeavour to 20 establish a cordial relation between France and Germany. It is because he thus operates a junction between the French spirit, and German ideas and German culture, that he founds something new, opens a fresh period, and deserves the attention of criticism far more than the German poets his contemporaries, who merely continue an old period till it expires. It may be predicted that in the literature of other countries, too, the French spirit is destined to make its influence felt,—as an element, in 30 alliance with the native spirit, of novelty and movement,—as it has made its influence felt in German literature ; fifty years hence a critic will be demonstrating to our grandchildren how this phenomenon has come to pass.

We in England, in our great burst of literature during the first thirty years of the present century, had no manifestation of the modern spirit, as this spirit manifests itself in Goethe's works or Heine's. And the reason is not far to seek. We had neither the German wealth of ideas, nor the French enthusiasm for applying ideas. There reigned in the mass of the nation that inveterate
 40 inaccessibility to ideas, that Philistinism,—to use the German nickname,—which reacts even on the individual genius that is exempt from it. In our greatest literary epoch, that of the Elizabethan age, English society at large was accessible to ideas, was permeated by them, was vivified by them, to a degree which has never been reached in England since. Hence the unique greatness in English literature of Shakspeare and his contemporaries; they were powerfully upheld by the intellectual life of their nation; they applied freely in literature the then modern ideas,—the ideas of the Renaissance and the Reformation. A few years afterwards the great English middle class, the kernel of the nation, the class whose intelligent sympathy had upheld a Shakspeare, entered the prison of Puritanism, and had the key turned on its spirit there for two hundred years. He enlargeth a nation, says Job, and straiteneth it again. In the literary movement of the beginning of the nineteenth century the signal attempt to apply freely the modern spirit was made in England by two members of the aristocratic class, Byron and Shelley. Aristocracies are, as such, naturally impenetrable by ideas; but their individual members have a high courage and a turn for breaking bounds; and a man of genius, who is the born child of the idea, happening to be born in the aristocratic ranks, chafes against the obstacles which prevent him from freely developing it. But Byron and Shelley did not succeed in their attempt freely to apply the modern spirit in English literature; they could not succeed in it; the resistance to baffle them, the want of intelligent sympathy to guide and uphold them, were too great. Their literary creation, compared with the literary creation of Shakspeare and Spenser, compared with the literary creation of Goethe and Heine, is a failure. The best literary creation of that time in England proceeded from men who did not make the same bold attempt as Byron and Shelley. What, in fact, was the career of the chief English men of letters, their contemporaries? The greatest of them, Wordsworth, retired (in Middle-Age phrase) into a monastery. I mean, he plunged himself in the inward life, he voluntarily cut himself off from the modern spirit. Coleridge took to opium. Scott became the historiographer royal of feudalism. Keats passionately gave himself up to a sensuous genius, to his faculty for interpreting nature; and he died of consumption at twenty-five. Wordsworth, Scott, and Keats have left admirable works; far more solid and complete works than those which Byron and Shelley have left. But their works have this defect;—they do not belong to that which is the main current of the literature of modern epochs, they do not apply modern ideas to life; they constitute, therefore, minor currents, and all other literary work of our day, however popular, which has the same 10 defect, also constitutes but a minor current. Byron and Shelley will be long remembered, long after the inadequacy of their actual work is clearly recognised, for their passionate, their Titanic effort to flow in the main stream of modern literature; their names will be greater than their writings; stat magni nominis umbra.

ARNOLD

K

Heine's literary good fortune was superior to that of Byron and Shelley. His theatre of operations was Germany, whose Philistinism does not consist in her want of ideas, or in her inaccessibility to ideas, for she 20 teems with them and loves them, but, as I have said, in her feeble and hesitating application of modern ideas to life. Heine's intense modernism, his absolute freedom, his utter rejection of stock classicism and stock romanticism, his bringing all things under the point of view of the nineteenth century, were understood and laid to heart by Germany, through virtue of her immense, tolerant intellectualism, much as there was in all Heine said to affront and wound Germany. The wit and ardent modern spirit of France Heine joined to the culture, the sentiment, the 30 thought of Germany. This is what makes him so remarkable; his wonderful clearness, lightness, and freedom, united with such power of feeling and width of range. Is there anywhere keener wit than in his story of the French abbé who was his tutor, and who wanted to get from him that la religion is French for der Glaube: "Six times did he ask me the question: "Henry, what is der Glaube in French?" and six times, and each time with a greater burst of tears, did I answer him—"It is le crédit." And at the seventh time, his face purple with rage, the infuriated out laughing. Since that day I have never been able to hear la religion mentioned, without feeling a tremor run through my back, and my cheeks grow red with shame.' Or in that comment on the fate of Professor Saalfeld, who had been addicted to writing furious pamphlets against Napoleon, and who was a professor at Göttingen, a great seat, according to Heine, of pedantry and Philistinism: 'It is curious,' says Heine, 'the three greatest adversaries of Napoleon have all of them ended miserably. Castlereagh cut his own throat; Louis the Eighteenth rotted upon 10 his throne; and Professor Saalfeld is still a professor at Göttingen.' It is impossible to go beyond that.
 40 questioner screamed out: "It is la religion;" and a rain of cuffs descended upon me, and all the other boys burst

What wit, again, in that saying which every one has heard: 'The Englishman loves liberty like his lawful wife, the Frenchman loves her like his mistress, the German loves her like his old grandmother.' But the turn Heine gives to this incomparable saying is not so well known; and it is by that turn he shows himself the born poet he is,—full of delicacy and tenderness, of inexhaustible resource, infinitely new and striking:— 20

'And yet, after all, no one can ever tell how things may turn out. The grumpy Englishman, in an ill-temper with his wife, is capable of some day putting a rope round her neck, and taking her to be sold at Smithfield. The inconstant Frenchman may become unfaithful to his adored mistress, and be seen fluttering about the Palais Royal after another. But the German will never quite abandon his old grandmother; he will always keep for her a nook by the chimney-corner, where she can tell her fairy stories to the listening children.' 30

Is it possible to touch more delicately and happily both the weakness and the strength of Germany;—pedantic, simple, enslaved, free, ridiculous, admirable Germany?

And Heine's verse,—his Lieder? Oh, the comfort, after dealing with French people of genius, irresistibly impelled to try and express themselves in verse, launching out into a deep which destiny has sown with so many rocks for them,—the comfort of coming to a man of genius, who finds in verse his freest and most perfect expression, whose voyage over the deep of poetry destiny 40 makes smooth! After the rhythm, to us, at any rate, with the German paste in our composition, so deeply unsatisfying, of—‘Ah! que me dites-vous, et que vous dit mon âme?

Que dit le ciel à l’aube et la flamme à la flamme?’

what a blessing to arrive at rhythms like—

‘Take, oh, take those lips away,
That so sweetly were forsworn—’ or—

10 ‘Siehst sehr sterbeblässig aus,
Doch getrost! du bist zu Haus—’ in which one’s soul can take pleasure! The magic of Heine’s poetical form is incomparable; he chiefly uses a form of old German popular poetry, a ballad-form which has more rapidity and grace than any ballad-form of ours; he employs this form with the most exquisite lightness and ease, and yet it has at the same time the inborn fulness, pathos, and old-world charm of all true forms of popular poetry. Thus in Heine’s poetry, too, one perpetually blends the impression of French modernism and 20 clearness, with that of German sentiment and fulness; and to give this blended impression is, as I have said, Heine’s great characteristic. To feel it, one must read him; he gives it in his form as well as in his contents, and by translation I can only reproduce it so far as his contents give it. But even the contents of many of his poems are capable of giving a certain sense of it. Here, for instance, is a poem in which he makes his profession of faith to an innocent beautiful soul, a sort of Gretchen, the child of some simple mining people having their hut

30 among the pines at the foot of the Hartz Mountains, who reproaches him with not holding the old articles of the Christian creed:—

‘Ah, my child, while I was yet a little boy, while I yet sate upon my mother’s knee, I believed in God the Father, who rules up there in Heaven, good and great;

‘Who created the beautiful earth, and the beautiful men and women thereon; who ordained for sun, moon, and stars their courses.

‘When I got bigger, my child, I comprehended yet a great deal more than this, and comprehended, and grew intelligent ; and I believe on the Son also ;

‘ On the beloved Son, who loved us, and revealed love to us ; and for his reward, as always happens, was crucified by the people.

‘ Now, when I am grown up, have read much, have travelled much, my heart swells within me, and with my whole heart I believe on the Holy Ghost.

‘ The greatest miracles were of his working, and still greater miracles doth he even now work ; he burst in 10 sunder the oppressor’s stronghold, and he burst in sunder the bondsman’s yoke.

‘ He heals old death-wounds, and renews the old right ; all mankind are one race of noble equals before him.

‘ He chases away the evil clouds and the dark cobwebs of the brain, which have spoilt love and joy for us, which day and night have loured on us.

‘ A thousand knights, well harnessed, has the Holy Ghost chosen out to fulfil his will, and he has put courage into their souls. 20

‘ Their good swords flash, their bright banners wave ; what, thou wouldst give much, my child, to look upon such gallant knights ?

‘ Well, on me, my child, look ! kiss me, and look boldly upon me ! one of those knights of the Holy Ghost am I.’

One has only to turn over the pages of his Romancero, —a collection of poems written in the first years of his illness, with his whole power and charm still in them, and not, like his latest poems of all, painfully touched by the air of his Matrazzen-gruft, his ‘mattress-grave,’—to see 30
Heine’s width of range ; the most varied figures succeed one another,—Rhampsinitus, Edith with the Swan Neck, Charles the First, Marie Antoinette, King David, a heroine of Mabille, Melisanda of Tripoli, Richard Cœur de Lion, Pedro the Cruel, Firdusi, Cortes, Dr. Döllinger ;—but never does Heine attempt to be hübsch objectiv, ‘beautifully objective,’ to become in spirit an old Egyptian, or an old Hebrew, or a Middle-Age knight, or a Spanish adventurer, or an English royalist ; he always remains Heinrich Heine, a son of the nineteenth century. To give a notion 40 of his tone I will quote a few stanzas at the end of the Spanish Atridae, in which he describes, in the character of a visitor at the court of Henry of Transtamare at Segovia, Henry's treatment of the children of his brother, Pedro the Cruel. Don Diego Albuquerque, his neighbour, strolls after dinner through the castle with him :—

' In the cloister-passage, which leads to the kennels where are kept the king's hounds, that with their growling and yelping let you know a long way off where they are,

' There I saw, built into the wall, and with a strong 10 iron grating for its outer face, a cell like a cage.

' Two human figures sate therein, two young boys ; chained by the leg, they crouched in the dirty straw.

' Hardly twelve years old seemed the one, the other not much older ; their faces fair and noble, but pale and wan with sickness.

' They were all in rags, almost naked ; and their lean bodies showed wounds, the marks of ill-usage ; both of them shivered with fever..

' They looked up at me out of the depth of their misery ;
20 " Who," I cried in horror to Don Diego, " are these pictures of wretchedness ? "

' Don Diego seemed embarrassed ; he looked round to see that no one was listening ; then he gave a deep sigh ; and at last, putting on the easy tone of a man of the world, he said :

" " These are a pair of king's sons, who were early left orphans ; the name of their father was King Pedro, the name of their mother, Maria de Padilla.

" " After the great battle of Navarette, when Henry of 30 Transtamare had relieved his brother, King Pedro, of the troublesome burden of the crown,

" " And likewise of that still more troublesome burden, which is called life, then Don Henry's victorious magnanimity had to deal with his brother's children.

" " He has adopted them, as an uncle should ; and he has given them free quarters in his own castle.

" " The room which he has assigned to them is certainly rather small, but then it is cool in summer, and not intolerably cold in winter.

40 " " Their fare is rye-bread, which tastes as sweet as if the goddess Ceres had baked it express for her beloved Proserpine.

“ Not unfrequently, too, he sends a scullion to them with garbanzos, and then the young gentlemen know that it is Sunday in Spain.

“ But it is not Sunday every day, and garbanzos do not come every day ; and the master of the hounds gives them the treat of his whip.

“ For the master of the hounds, who has under his superintendence the kennels and the pack, and the nephews' cage also,

“ Is the unfortunate husband of that lemon-faced 10 woman with the white ruff, whom we remarked to-day at dinner.

“ And she scolds so sharp, that often her husband snatches his whip, and rushes down here, and gives it to the dogs and to the poor little boys.

“ But his majesty has expressed his disapproval of such proceedings, and has given orders that for the future his nephews are to be treated differently from the dogs.

“ He has determined no longer to entrust the disciplining of his nephews to a mercenary stranger, but to 20 carry it out with his own hands.”

‘ Don Diego stopped abruptly ; for the seneschal of the castle joined us, and politely expressed his hope that we had dined to our satisfaction.’

Observe how the irony of the whole of that, finishing with the grim innuendo of the last stanza but one, is at once truly masterly and truly modern.

No account of Heine is complete which does not notice the Jewish element in him. His race he treated with the same freedom with which he treated everything else, 30 but he derived a great force from it, and no one knew this better than he himself. He has excellently pointed out how in the sixteenth century there was a double renaissance,—a Hellenic renaissance and a Hebrew renaissance,—and how both have been great powers ever since. He himself had in him both the spirit of Greece and the spirit of Judaea ; both these spirits reach the infinite, which is the true goal of all poetry and all art,—the Greek spirit by beauty, the Hebrew spirit by sublimity. By his perfection of literary form, by his love of clearness, 40 by his love of beauty, Heine is Greek ; by his intensity, by his untamableness, by his 'longing which cannot be uttered,' he is Hebrew. Yet what Hebrew ever treated the things of the Hebrews like this?—

'There lives at Hamburg, in a one-roomed lodging in the Baker's Broad Walk, a man whose name is Moses Lump; all the week he goes about in wind and rain, with his pack on his back, to earn his few shillings; but when on Friday evening he comes home, he finds the candlestick with seven candles lighted, and the table 10 covered with a fair white cloth, and he puts away from him his pack and his cares, and he sits down to table with his squinting wife and yet more squinting daughter, and eats fish with them, fish which has been dressed in beautiful white garlic sauce, sings therewith the grandest psalms of King David, rejoices with his whole heart over the deliverance of the children of Israel out of Egypt, rejoices, too, that all the wicked ones who have done the children of Israel hurt, have ended by taking themselves off; that King Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, Haman,
 20 Antiochus, Titus, and all such people, are well dead, while he, Moses Lump, is yet alive, and eating fish with wife and daughter; and I can tell you, Doctor, the fish is delicate and the man is happy, he has no call to torment himself about culture, he sits contented in his religion and in his green bed-gown, like Diogenes in his tub, he contemplates with satisfaction his candles, which he on no account will snuff for himself; and I can tell you, if the candles burn a little dim, and the snuffers-woman, whose business it is to snuff them, is not at hand, and Rothschild the Great 30 were at that moment to come in, with all his brokers, bill discounters, agents, and chief clerks, with whom he conquers the world, and Rothschild were to say: "Moses Lump, ask of me what favour you will, and it shall be granted you;"—Doctor, I am convinced, Moses Lump would quietly answer: "Snuff me those candles!" and Rothschild the Great would exclaim with admiration: "If I were not Rothschild, I would be Moses Lump."'

There Heine shows us his own people by its comic side; in the poem of the Princess Sabbath he shows it to 40 us by a more serious side. The Princess Sabbath, 'the tranquil Princess, pearl and flower of all beauty, fair as the Queen of Sheba, Solomon's bosom friend, that blue stocking from Ethiopia who wanted to shine by her esprit, and with her wise riddles made herself in the long run a bore' (with Heine the sarcastic turn is never far off), this princess has for her betrothed a prince whom sorcery has transformed into an animal of lower race, the Prince Israel.

'A dog with the desires of a dog, he wallows all the week long in the filth and refuse of life, amidst the jeers of the boys in the street. 10

'But every Friday evening, at the twilight hour, suddenly the magic passes off, and the dog becomes once more a human being.

'A man with the feelings of a man, with head and heart raised aloft, in festal garb, in almost clean garb, he enters the halls of his Father.

'Hail, beloved halls of my royal Father! Ye tents of Jacob, I kiss with my lips your holy door-posts!'

Still more he shows us this serious side in his beautiful poem on Jehuda ben Halevy, a poet belonging to 'the 20 great golden age of the Arabian, Old-Spanish, Jewish school of poets,' a contemporary of the troubadours:—

'He, too,—the hero whom we sing,—Jehuda ben Halevy, too, had his lady-love; but she was of a special sort.

'She was no Laura, whose eyes, mortal stars, in the cathedral on Good Friday kindled that world-renowned flame.

'She was no châtelaine, who in the blooming glory of her youth presided at tourneys, and awarded the victor's crown. 30

'No casuistess in the Gay Science was she, no lady doctrinaire, who delivered her oracles in the judgment-chamber of a Court of Love.

'She, whom the Rabbi loved, was a woe-begone poor darling, a mourning picture of desolation . . . and her name was Jerusalem.'

Jehuda ben Halevy, like the Crusaders, makes his pilgrimage to Jerusalem; and there, amid the ruins, sings a song of Sion which has become famous among his people:— 40

'That lay of pearled tears is the wide-famed Lament, which is sung in all the scattered tents of Jacob throughout the world,

‘ On the ninth day of the month which is called Ab, on the anniversary of Jerusalem’s destruction by Titus Vespasianus.

‘ Yes, that is the song of Sion, which Jehuda ben Halevy sang with his dying breath amid the holy ruins of Jerusalem.

‘ Barefoot, and in penitential weeds, he sate there upon 10 the fragment of a fallen column ; down to his breast fell,

‘ Like a grey forest, his hair ; and cast a weird shadow on the face which looked out through it,—his troubled pale face, with the spiritual eyes.

‘ So he sate and sang, like unto a seer out of the fore-time to look upon ; Jeremiah, the Ancient, seemed to have risen out of his grave.

‘ But a bold Saracen came riding that way, aloft on his barb, lolling in his saddle, and brandishing a naked 20 javelin ;

‘ Into the breast of the poor singer he plunged his deadly shaft, and shot away like a winged shadow.

‘ Quietly flowed the Rabbi’s life-blood, quietly he sang his song to an end ; and his last dying sigh was Jerusalem ! ’

But, most of all, Heine shows us this side in a strange poem describing a public dispute, before King Pedro and his court, between a Jewish and a Christian champion, on the merits of their respective faiths. In the strain of the 30 Jew all the fierceness of the old Hebrew genius, all its rigid defiant Monotheism, appear :—

‘ Our God has not died like a poor innocent lamb for mankind ; he is no gushing philanthropist, no declaimer.

‘ Our God is not love ; caressing is not his line ; but he is a God of thunder, and he is a God of revenge.

‘ The lightnings of his wrath strike inexorably every sinner, and the sins of the fathers are often visited upon their remote posterity.

‘ Our God, he is alive, and in his hall of heaven he 40 goes on existing away, throughout all the eternities.

‘ Our God, too, is a God in robust health, no myth, pale and thin as sacrificial wafers, or as shadows by Coeytus.

'Our God is strong. In his hand he upholds sun, moon, and stars; thrones break, nations reel to and fro, when he knits his forehead.

'Our God loves music, the voice of the harp and the song of feasting; but the sound of church-bells he hates, as he hates the grunting of pigs.'

Nor must Heine's sweetest note be unheard,—his plaintive note, his note of melancholy. Here is a strain<sup>10</sup> which came from him as he lay, in the winter night, on his 'mattress-grave' at Paris, and let his thoughts wander home to Germany, 'the great child, entertaining herself with her Christmas-tree.' 'Thou tookest,'—he cries to the German exile,—

'Thou tookest thy flight towards sunshine and happiness; naked and poor returnest thou back. German truth, German shirts,—one gets them worn to tatters in foreign parts.

'Deadly pale are thy looks, but take comfort, thou<sup>20</sup> art at home; one lies warm in German earth, warm as by the old pleasant fireside.

'Many a one, alas! became crippled, and could get home no more: longingly he stretches out his arms; God have mercy upon him!'

God have mercy upon him! for what remain of the days of the years of his life are few and evil. 'Can it be that I still actually exist? My body is so shrunk that there is hardly anything of me left but my voice, and my bed makes me think of the melodious grave of the enchanter Merlin,<sup>30</sup> which is in the forest of Broceliand in Brittany, under high oaks whose tops shine like green flames to heaven. Ah, I envy thee those trees, brother Merlin, and their fresh waving! for over my mattress-grave here in Paris no green leaves rustle; and early and late I hear nothing but the rattle of carriages, hammering, scolding, and the jingle of the piano. A grave without rest, death without the privileges of the departed, who have no longer any need to spend money, or to write letters, or to compose books. What a melancholy situation!'

He died, and has left a blemished name; with his<sup>40</sup>

crying faults,—his intemperate susceptibility, his unscrupulousness in passion, his inconceivable attacks on his enemies, his still more inconceivable attacks on his friends, his want of generosity, his sensuality, his incessant mocking,—how could it be otherwise? Not only was he not one of Mr. Carlyle's 'respectable' people, he was profoundly disrespectable; and not even the merit of not being a Philistine can make up for a man's being that. To his intellectual deliverance there was an addition of some-10 thing else wanting, and that something else was something immense; the old-fashioned, laborious, eternally needful moral deliverance. Goethe says that he was deficient in love; to me his weakness seems to be not so much a deficiency in love as a deficiency in self-respect, in true dignity of character. But on this negative side of one's criticism of a man of great genius, I for my part, when I have once clearly marked that this negative side is and must be there, have no pleasure in dwelling. I prefer to say of Heine something positive. He is not an 20 adequate interpreter of the modern world. He is only a brilliant soldier in the war of liberation of humanity. But, such as he is, he is (and posterity too, I am quite sure, will say this), in the European poetry of that quarter of a century which follows the death of Goethe, incomparably the most important figure.

What a spendthrift, one is tempted to cry, is Nature! With what prodigality, in the march of generations, she employs human power, content to gather almost always little result from it, sometimes none! Look at Byron, 30 that Byron whom the present generation of Englishmen are forgetting; Byron, the greatest natural force, the greatest elementary power, I cannot but think, which has appeared in our literature since Shakspeare. And what became of this wonderful production of nature? He shattered himself, he inevitably shattered himself to pieces, against the huge, black, cloud-topped, interminable precipice of British Philistinism. But Byron, it may be said, was eminent only by his genius, only by his inborn force and fire; he had not the intellectual equipment of culture and with no ideas. Well, then, look at Heine. Heine had all the culture of Germany ; in his head fermented all the ideas of modern Europe. And what have we got from Heine ? A half-result, for want of moral balance, and of nobleness of soul and character. That is what I say ; there is so much power, so many seem able to run well, so many give promise of running well ; so few reach the goal, so few are chosen. Many are called, few chosen.
 40 a supreme modern poet; except for his genius he was an ordinary nineteenth-century English gentleman, with little

PAGAN AND MEDIAEVAL RELIGIOUS SENTIMENT

I READ the other day in the Dublin Review:—‘ We Catholics are apt to be cowed and scared by the lordly oppression of public opinion, and not to bear ourselves as men in the face of the anti-Catholic society of England. It is good to have an habitual consciousness that the public opinion of Catholic Europe looks upon Protestant England with a mixture of impatience and compassion, which more than balances the arrogance of the English people towards the Catholic Church in these countries.’

- 10 The Holy Catholic Church, Apostolic and Roman, can take very good care of herself, and I am not going to defend her against the scorns of Exeter Hall. Catholicism is not a great visible force in this country, and the mass of mankind will always treat lightly even things the most venerable, if they do not present themselves as visible forces before its eyes. In Catholic countries, as the Dublin Review itself says with triumph, they make very little account of the greatness of Exeter Hall. The majority has eyes only for the things of the majority, and
- 20 in England the immense majority is Protestant. And yet, in spite of all the shocks which the feeling of a good Catholic, like the writer in the Dublin Review, has in this Protestant country inevitably to undergo, in spite of the contemptuous insensibility to the grandeur of Rome which he finds so general and so hard to bear, how much has he to console him, how many acts of homage to the greatness of his religion may he see if he has his eyes open ! I will tell him of one of them. Let him go in London to that delightful spot, that Happy Island in Bloomsbury, the reading-room
- 30 of the British Museum. Let him visit its sacred quarter, the region where its theological books are placed. I am almost afraid to say what he will find there, for fear Mr. Spurgeon, like a second Caliph Omar, should give the library to the flames. He will find an immense Catholic work, the collection of the Abbé Migne, lording it over that whole region, reducing to insignificance the feeble Protestant forces which hang upon its skirts. Protestantism is duly represented, indeed: the librarian knows his business too well to suffer it to be otherwise; all the varieties of Protestantism are there; there is the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, learned, decorous, exemplary, but a little uninteresting; there are the works of Calvin, rigid, militant, menacing; there are the works of Dr. 10 Chalmers, the Scotch thistle valiantly doing duty as the rose of Sharon, but keeping something very Scotch about it all the time; there are the works of Dr. Channing, the last word of religious philosophy in a land where every one has some culture and where superiorities are discountenanced,—the flower of moral and intelligent mediocrity. But how are all these divided against one another, and how, though they were all united, are they dwarfed by the Catholic Leviathan, their neighbour! Majestic in its blue and gold unity, this fills shelf after shelf and compartment 20 after compartment, its right mounting up into heaven among the white folios of the Acta Sanctorum, its left plunging down into hell among the yellow octavos of the Law Digest. Everything is there, in that immense Patrologiæ Cursus Completus, in that Encyclopédie Théologique, that Nouvelle Encyclopédie Théologique, that Troisième Encyclopédie Théologique; religion, philosophy, history, biography, arts, sciences, bibliography, gossip. The work embraces the whole range of human interests; like one of the great Middle-Age Cathedrals, it is in itself a study for a life. Like 30 the net in Scripture, it drags everything to land, bad and good, lay and ecclesiastical, sacred and profane, so that it be but matter of human concern. Wide-embracing as the power whose product it is! a power, for history at any rate, eminently the Church; not, perhaps, the Church of the future, but indisputably the Church of the past, and, in the past, the Church of the multitude.

This is why the man of imagination—nay, and the philosopher too, in spite of her propensity to burn him—will always have a weakness for the Catholic Church; 40 because of the rich treasures of human life which have been stored within her pale. The mention of other religious bodies, or of their leaders, at once calls up in our mind the thought of men of a definite type as their adherents; the mention of Catholicism suggests no such special following. Anglicanism suggests the English episcopate; Calvin's name suggests Dr. Candlish; Chalmers's, the Duke of Argyll; Channing's, Boston society; but Catholicism suggests,—what shall I say?—all the pell-mell of the men and women of Shakspeare's plays. This abundance the 10 Abbé Migne's collection faithfully reflects. People talk of this or that work which they would choose, if they were to pass their life with only one; for my part I think I would choose the Abbé Migne's collection. Quicquid agunt homines,—everything, as I have said, is there. Do not seek in it splendour of form, perfection of editing; its paper is common, its type ugly, its editing indifferent, its printing careless. The greatest and most baffling crowd of misprints I ever met with in my life occurs in a very important page of the introduction to the Dictionnaire des 20 Apocryphes. But this is just what you have in the world,—quantity rather than quality. Do not seek in it impartiality, the critical spirit; in reading it you must do the criticism for yourself; it loves criticism as little as the world loves it. Like the world, it chooses to have things all its own way, to abuse its adversary, to back its own notion through thick and thin, to put forward all the pros for its own notion, to suppress all the contras; it does just all that the world does, and all that the critical shrinks from. Open the 30 Dictionnaire des Erreurs Sociales: 'The religious persecutions of Henry the Eighth's and Edward the Sixth's time abated a little in the reign of Mary, to break out again with new fury in the reign of Elizabeth.' There is a summary of the history of religious persecution under the Tudors! But how unreasonable to reproach the Abbé Migne's work with wanting a criticism, which, by the very nature of things, it cannot have, and not rather to be grateful to it for its abundance, its variety, its infinite suggestiveness, its happy adoption, in many a delicate circumstance, of the urbane tone and temper of the man 40 of the world, instead of the acrid tone and temper of the fanatic!

ARNOLD

L

Still, in spite of their fascinations, the contents of this collection sometimes rouse the critical spirit within one. It happened that lately, after I had been thinking much of Marcus Aurelius and his times, I took down the Dictionnaire des Origines du Christianisme, to see what it had to say about paganism and pagans. I found much what I expected. I read the article, Révélation Évangélique, sa Nécessité. There I found what a sink of iniquity was the whole pagan world; how one Roman fed his oysters on his slaves, how another put a slave to death that a curious friend might see what dying was like; how Galen's mother tore and bit her waiting-women when she was in a passion with them. I found this account of the religion of paganism: 'Paganism invented a mob of divinities with the most hateful character, and attributed to them the most monstrous and abominable crimes. It personified in them drunkenness, incest, kidnapping, adultery, sensuality, knavery, cruelty, and rage.' And I found that from this religion there followed such practice as was to be expected: 'What must naturally have been the state of morals under the influence of such a religion, which penetrated with its own spirit the public life, the family life, and the individual life of antiquity?'

The colours in this picture are laid on very thick, and I for my part cannot believe that any human societies, with a religion and practice such as those just described, could ever have endured as the societies of Greece and Rome endured, still less have done what the societies of Greece and Rome did. We are not brought far by descriptions of the vices of great cities, or even of individuals driven mad by unbounded means of self-indulgence. Feudal and aristocratic life in Christendom has produced horrors of selfishness and cruelty not surpassed by the grandee of pagan Rome; and then, again, in antiquity there is Marcus Aurelius's mother to set against Galen's. Eminent examples of vice and virtue in individuals prove little as to the state of societies. What, under the first emperors, was the condition of the Roman poor upon the Aventine compared with that of our poor in Spitalfields and Bethnal Green? What, in comfort, morals, and happiness, were the rural population of the Sabine country under Augustus's rule, compared with the rural population of Hertfordshire and Buckinghamshire under the rule of Queen Victoria ?

But these great questions are not now for me. Without trying to answer them, I ask myself, when I read such declamation as the foregoing, if I can find anything that will give me a near, distinct sense of the real difference in spirit and sentiment between paganism and Christianity, and of the natural effect of this difference upon people 10 in general. I take a representative religious poem of paganism,—of the paganism which all the world has in its mind when it speaks of paganism. To be a representative poem, it must be one for popular use, one that the multitude listens to. Such a religious poem may be found at the end of one of the best and happiest of Theocritus's idylls, the fifteenth. In order that the reader may the better go along with me in the line of thought I am following, I will translate it; and, that he may see the medium in 20 society out of which it grows, the people who form it and are formed by it, I will translate the whole, or nearly the whole, of the idyll (it is not long) in which the poem occurs.

The idyll is dramatic. Somewhere about two hundred and eighty years before the Christian era, a couple of Syracusan women, staying at Alexandria, agreed on the occasion of a great religious solemnity,—the feast of Adonis,—to go together to the palace of King Ptolemy Philadelphus, to see the image of Adonis, which the queen Arsinoë, Ptolemy's wife, had had decorated with 30 peculiar magnificence. A hymn, by a celebrated performer, was to be recited over the image. The names of the two women are Gorgo and Praxinoë; their maids, who are mentioned in the poem, are called Eunoe and Eutythis. Gorgo comes by appointment to Praxinoë's house to fetch her, and there the dialogue begins:—

Gorgo.—Is Praxinoë at home ?

Praxinoë.—My dear Gorgo, at last! Yes, here I am. Eunoe, find a chair,—get a cushion for it.

Gorgo.—It will do beautifully as it is.

40 Praxinoë.—Do sit down.

Gorgo.—Oh, this gad-about spirit! I could hardly get to you, Praxinoe, through all the crowd and all the carriages. Nothing but heavy boots, nothing but men in uniform. And what a journey it is! My dear child, you really live too far off.

Praxinoe.—It is all that insane husband of mine. He has chosen to come out here to the end of the world, and take a hole of a place,—for a house it is not,—on purpose that you and I might not be neighbours. He is always just the same ;—anything to quarrel with one! anything for spite!

10

Gorgo.—My dear, don't talk so of your husband before the little fellow. Just see how astonished he looks at you. Never mind, Zopyrio, my pet, she is not talking about papa.

Praxinoe.—Good heavens! the child does really understand.

Gorgo.—Pretty papa!

Praxinoe.—That pretty papa of his the other day (though I told him beforehand to mind what he was about), when I sent him to a shop to buy soap and rouge, brought me home salt instead ;—stupid, great, big, interminable animal!

Gorgo.—Mine is just the fellow to him. . . . But never mind now, get on your things and let us be off to the palace to see the Adonis. I hear the queen's decorations are something splendid.

Praxinoe.—In grand people's houses everything is grand. What things you have seen in Alexandria! What a deal you will have to tell to anybody who has never been here!

Gorgo.—Come, we ought to be going.

30

Praxinoe.—Every day is holiday to people who have nothing to do. Eunoe, pick up your work; and take care, lazy girl, how you leave it lying about again; the cats find it just the bed they like. Come, stir yourself, fetch me some water, quick! I wanted the water first, and the girl brings me the soap. Never mind; give it me. Not all that, extravagant! Now pour out the water;—stupid! why don't you take care of my dress? That will do. I have got my hands washed as it pleased God. Where is the key of the large wardrobe? Bring it here;—
quick!

Gorgo.—Praxinoe, you can't think how well that dress, made full, as you've got it, suits you. Tell me, how much did it cost?—the dress by itself, I mean.

Praxinoe.—Don't talk of it, Gorgo: more than eight guineas of good hard money. And about the work on it I have almost worn my life out.

Gorgo.—Well, you couldn't have done better.

Praxinoe.—Thank you. Bring me my shawl, and put my hat properly on my head;—properly. No, child (to her little boy), I am not going to take you; there's a bogy on horseback, who bites. Cry as much as you like; I'm not going to have you lamed for life. Now we'll start. Nurse, take the little one and amuse him; call the dog in, and shut the street-door. (They go out.) Good heavens! what a crowd of people! How on earth are we ever to get through all this? They are like ants: you can't count them. My dearest Gorgo, what will become of us? here are the royal Horse Guards. My good man, don't ride over me! Look at that bay horse rearing bolt upright;
20 what a vicious one! Eunoe, you mad girl, do take care!—that horse will certainly be the death of the man on his back. How glad I am now, that I left the child safe at home!

Gorgo.—All right, Praxinoe, we are safe behind them; and they have gone on to where they are stationed.

Praxinoe.—Well, yes, I begin to revive again. From the time I was a little girl I have had more horror of horses and snakes than of anything in the world. Let us get on; here's a great crowd coming this way upon us.

Gorgo (to an old woman).—Mother, are you from the 30 palace?

Old Woman.—Yes, my dears.

Gorgo.—Has one a tolerable chance of getting there?

Old Woman.—My pretty young lady, the Greeks got to Troy by dint of trying hard; trying will do anything in this world.

Gorgo.—The old creature has delivered herself of an oracle and departed.

Praxinoe.—Women can tell you everything about everything, Jupiter's marriage with Juno not excepted.

40 Gorgo.—Look, Praxinoe, what a squeeze at the palace gates!

Praxinoe.—Tremendous! Take hold of me, Gorgo; and you, Eunoe, take hold of Eutychis!—tight hold, or you'll be lost. Here we go in all together. Hold tight to us, Eunoe! Oh, dear! oh, dear! Gorgo, there's my scarf torn right in two. For heaven's sake, my good man, as you hope to be saved, take care of my dress!

Stranger.—I'll do what I can, but it doesn't depend upon me.

Praxinoe.—What heaps of people! They push like a drove of pigs. 10

Stranger.—Don't be frightened, ma'am, we are all right.

Praxinoe.—May you be all right, my dear sir, to the last day you live, for the care you have taken of us! What a kind, considerate man! There is Eunoe jammed in a squeeze. Push, you goose, push! Capital! We are all of us the right side of the door, as the bridegroom said when he had locked himself in with the bride.

Gorgo.—Praxinoe, come this way. Do but look at that work, how delicate it is!—how exquisite! Why, they 20 might wear it in heaven.

Praxinoe.—Heavenly patroness of needlewomen, what hands were hired to do that work? Who designed those beautiful patterns? They seem to stand up and move about, as if they were real;—as if they were living things, and not needlework. Well, man is a wonderful creature! And look, look, how charming he lies there on his silver couch, with just a soft down on his cheeks, that beloved Adonis,—Adonis, whom one loves, even though he is dead! 30

Another Stranger.—You wretched women, do stop your incessant chatter! Like turtles, you go on for ever. They are enough to kill one with their broad lingo,—nothing but a, a, a.

Gorgo.—Lord, where does the man come from? What is it to you if we are chatterboxes? Order about your own servants! Do you give orders to Syracusan women? If you want to know, we came originally from Corinth, as Bellerophon did; we speak Peloponnesian. I suppose Dorian women may be allowed to have a Dorian accent. 40

Praxinoe.—Oh, honey-sweet Proserpine, let us have no more masters than the one we've got! We don't the least care for you; pray don't trouble yourself for nothing.

Gorgo.—Be quiet, Praxinoe! That first-rate singer, the Argive woman's daughter, is going to sing the Adonis hymn. She is the same who was chosen to sing the dirge last year. We are sure to have something first-rate from her. She is going through her airs and graces, ready to begin.—

So far the dialogue; and, as it stands in the original, 10 it can hardly be praised too highly. It is a page torn fresh out of the book of human life. What freedom! What animation! What gaiety! What naturalness! It is said that Theocritus, in composing this poem, borrowed from a work of Sophron, a poet of an earlier and better time; but, even if this is so, the form is still Theocritus's own, and how excellent is that form, how masterly! And this in a Greek poem of the decadence; for Theocritus's poetry, after all, is poetry of the decadence. When such is Greek poetry of the decadence, what must be Greek 20 poetry of the prime?

Then the singer begins her hymn:—

'Mistress, who lovest the haunts of Golgi, and Idalium, and high-peaked Eryx, Aphrodite that playest with gold! how have the delicate-footed Hours, after twelve months, brought thy Adonis back to thee from the ever-flowing Acheron! Tardiest of the immortals are the boon Hours, but all mankind wait their approach with longing, for they ever bring something with them. O Cypris, Dione's child! thou didst change—so is the story among men—Berenice 30 from mortal to immortal, by dropping ambrosia into her fair bosom; and in gratitude to thee for this, O thou of many names and many temples! Berenice's daughter, Arsinoe, lovely Helen's living counterpart, makes much of Adonis with all manner of braveries.

'All fruits that the tree bears are laid before him, all treasures of the garden in silver baskets, and alabaster boxes, gold-inlaid, of Syrian ointment; and all confec- tionery that cunning women make on their kneading-tray, kneading up every sort of flowers with white meal, and 40 all that they make of sweet honey and delicate oil, and all winged and creeping things are here set before him.

And there are built for him green bowers with wealth of tender anise, and little boy-loves flutter about over them, like young nightingales trying their new wings on the tree, from bough to bough. Oh, the ebony, the gold, the eagle of white ivory that bears aloft his cup-bearer to Kronos-born Zeus! And up there, see! a second couch strewn for lovely Adonis, scarlet coverlets softer than sleep itself (so Miletus and the Samian wool-grower will say); Cypris has hers, and the rosy-armed Adonis has his, that eighteen or nineteen-year-old bridegroom. His kisses will not wound, the hair on his lip is yet light.

'Now, Cypris, good-night, we leave thee with thy bridegroom; but to-morrow morning, with the earliest dew, we will one and all bear him forth to where the waves splash upon the sea-strand, and letting loose our locks, and letting fall our robes, with bosoms bare, we will set up this, our melodious strain:

"Beloved Adonis, alone of the demigods (so men say) thou art permitted to visit both us and Acheron! This lot had neither Agamemnon, nor the mighty moonstruck hero Ajax, nor Hector the first-born of Hecuba's twenty children, nor Patroclus, nor Pyrrhus who came home from Troy, nor those yet earlier Lapithae and the sons of Deucalion, nor the Pelasgians, the root of Argos and of Pelops' isle. Be gracious to us now, loved Adonis, and be favourable to us for the year to come! Dear to us hast thou been at this coming, dear to us shalt thou be when thou comest again."

The poem concludes with a characteristic speech from Gorgo:—

'Praxinoe, certainly women are wonderful things. That lucky woman to know all that! and luckier still to have such a splendid voice! And now we must see about getting home. My husband has not had his dinner. That man is all vinegar, and nothing else; and if you keep him waiting for his dinner, he's dangerous to go near. Adieu, precious Adonis, and may you find us all well when you come next year!'

So, with the hymn still in her ears, says the incorrigible Gorgo.

But what a hymn that is! Of religious emotion, in our acceptation of the words, and of the comfort springing from religious emotion, not a particle. And yet many elements of religious emotion are contained in the beautiful story of Adonis. Symbolically treated, as the thoughtful man might treat it, as the Greek mysteries undoubtedly treated it, this story was capable of a noble and touching application, and could lead the soul to elevating and consoling thoughts. Adonis was the sun in his summer and in his winter course, in his time of triumph and his time of 10 defeat; but in his time of triumph still moving towards his defeat, in his time of defeat still returning towards his triumph. Thus he became an emblem of the power of life and the bloom of beauty, the power of human life and the bloom of human beauty, hastening inevitably to diminution and decay, yet in that very decay finding

‘Hope, and a renovation without end.’

But nothing of this appears in the story as prepared for popular religious use, as presented to the multitude in a popular religious ceremony. Its treatment is not devoid 20 of a certain grace and beauty, but it has nothing whatever that is elevating, nothing that is consoling, nothing that is in our sense of the word religious. The religious ceremonies of Christendom, even on occasion of the most joyful and mundane matters, present the multitude with strains of profoundly religious character, such as the Kyrie eleison and the Te Deum. But this Greek hymn to Adonis adapts itself exactly to the tone and temper of a gay and pleasure-loving multitude,—of light-hearted people, like Gorgo and Praxinoe, whose moral nature is 30 much of the same calibre as that of Phillina in Goethe’s Wilhelm Meister, people who seem never made to be serious, never made to be sick or sorry. And, if they happen to be sick or sorry, what will they do then? But that we have no right to ask. Phillina, within the enchanted bounds of Goethe’s novel, Gorgo and Praxinoe, within the enchanted bounds of Theocritus’s poem, never will be sick and sorry, never can be sick and sorry. The ideal, cheerful, sensuous, pagan life is not sick or sorry. No; yet its means in itself suggests the thought of horror and misery, which even, in many ways, gratifies the senses and the understanding ; but by the very intensity and unremittingness of its appeal to the senses and the understanding, by its stimulating a single side of us too absolutely, ends by fatiguing and revolting us ; ends by leaving us with a sense of confinement, of oppression,—with a desire for an utter change, for clouds, storms, effusion and relief.
40 natural end is in the sort of life which Pompeii and Herculaneum bring so vividly before us,—a life which by no

In the beginning of the thirteenth century, when the clouds and storms had come, when the gay sensuous 10 pagan life was gone, when men were not living by the senses and understanding, when they were looking for the speedy coming of Antichrist, there appeared in Italy, to the north of Rome, in the beautiful Umbrian country at the foot of the Apennines, a figure of the most magical power and charm, St. Francis. His century is, I think, the most interesting in the history of Christianity after its primitive age, more interesting than even the century 20 of the Reformation ; and one of the chief figures, perhaps the very chief, to which this interest attaches itself, is St. Francis. And why ? Because of the profound popular instinct which enabled him, more than any man since the primitive age, to fit religion for popular use. He brought religion to the people. He founded the most popular body of ministers of religion that has ever existed in the Church. He transformed monachism by uprooting the stationary monk, delivering him from the bondage of property, and sending him, as a mendicant friar, to be a stranger and sojourner, not in the wilderness, but in the most crowded haunts of men, to console them and to do them good. 30 This popular instinct of his is at the bottom of his famous marriage with poverty. Poverty and suffering are the condition of the people, the multitude, the immense majority of mankind ; and it was towards this people that his soul yearned. 'He listens,' it was said of him, 'to those to whom God himself will not listen.'

So in return, as no other man he was listened to. When an Umbrian town or village heard of his approach, the whole population went out in joyful procession to meet him, with green boughs, flags, music, and songs of glad- 40 ness. The master, who began with two disciples, could in his own lifetime (and he died at forty-four) collect to keep Whitsuntide with him, in presence of an immense multitude, five thousand of his Minorites. And thus he found fulfilment to his prophetic cry : ' I hear in my ears the sound of the tongues of all the nations who shall come unto us ; Frenchmen, Spaniards, Germans, Englishmen. The Lord will make of us a great people, even unto the ends of the earth.'

Prose could not satisfy this ardent soul, and he made 10 poetry. Latin was too learned for this simple, popular nature, and he composed in his mother tongue, in Italian. The beginnings of the mundane poetry of the Italians are in Sicily, at the court of kings ; the beginnings of their religious poetry are in Umbria, with St. Francis. His are the humble upper waters of a mighty stream : at the beginning of the thirteenth century it is St. Francis, at the end, Dante. Now it happens that St. Francis, too, like the Alexandrian songstress, has his hymn for the sun, for Adonis ; Canticle of the Sun, Canticle of the Creatures,— 20 the poem goes by both names. Like the Alexandrian hymn, it is designed for popular use, but not for use by King Ptolemy's people ; artless in language, irregular in rhythm, it matches with the childlike genius that produced it, and the simple natures that loved and repeated it :—

' O most high, almighty, good Lord God, to thee belong praise, glory, honour, and all blessing !

' Praised be my Lord God with all his creatures ; and specially our brother the sun, who brings us the day, and who brings us the light ; fair is he, and shining with a very 30 great splendour : O Lord, he signifies to us thee !

' Praised be my Lord for our sister the moon, and for the stars, the which he has set clear and lovely in heaven.

' Praised be my Lord for our brother the wind, and for air and cloud, calms and all weather, by the which thou upholdest in life all creatures.

' Praised be my Lord for our sister water, who is very serviceable unto us, and humble, and precious, and clean.

' Praised be my Lord for our brother fire, through whom thou givest us light in the darkness ; and he is bright, 40 and pleasant, and very mighty, and strong.

' Praised be my Lord for our mother the earth, the which doth sustain us and keep us, and bringeth forth divers fruits, and flowers of many colours, and grass.

'Praised be my Lord for all those who pardon one another for his love's sake, and who endure weakness and tribulation; blessed are they who peaceably shall endure, for thou, O most Highest, shalt give them a crown!

'Praised be my Lord for our sister, the death of the body, from whom no man escapeth. Woe to him who dieth in mortal sin! Blessed are they who are found walking by thy most holy will, for the second death shall 10 have no power to do them harm.

'Praise ye, and bless ye the Lord, and give thanks unto him, and serve him with great humility.'

It is natural that man should take pleasure in his senses. But it is natural, also, that he should take refuge in his heart and imagination from his misery. And when one thinks what human life is for the vast majority of mankind, how little of a feast for their senses it can possibly be, one understands the charm for them of a refuge offered in the heart and imagination. Above all, when one thinks 20 what human life was in the Middle Ages, one understands the charm of such a refuge.

Now, the poetry of Theocritus's hymn is poetry treating the world according to the demand of the senses; the poetry of St. Francis's hymn is poetry treating the world according to the demand of the heart and imagination. The first takes the world by its outward, sensible side; the second by its inward, symbolical side. The first admits as much of the world as is pleasure-giving; the second admits the whole world, rough and smooth, painful and 30 pleasure-giving, all alike, but all transfigured by the power of a spiritual emotion, all brought under a law of supersensual love, having its seat in the soul. It can thus even say: 'Praised be my Lord for our sister, the death of the body.'

But these very words are, perhaps, an indication that we are touching upon an extreme. When we see Pompeii, we can put our finger upon the pagan sentiment in its extreme. And when we read of Monte Alverno and the stigmata; when we read of the repulsive, because self- 40 caused, sufferings of the end of St. Francis's life; when we find even him saying, 'I have sinned against my brother the ass,' meaning by these words that he had been too hard upon his own body ; when we find him assailed, even himself, by the doubt 'whether he who had destroyed himself by the severity of his penances could find mercy in eternity,' we can put our finger on the mediaeval Christian sentiment in its extreme. Human nature is neither all senses and understanding, nor all heart and imagination. Pompeii was a sign that for humanity at 10 large the measure of sensualism had been over-passed ; St. Francis's doubt was a sign that for humanity at large the measure of spiritualism had been over-passed. Humanity, in its violent rebound from one extreme, had swung from Pompeii to Monte Alverno ; but it was sure not to stay there.

The Renaissance is, in part, a return towards the pagan spirit, in the special sense in which I have been using the word pagan ; a return towards the life of the senses and the understanding. The Reformation, on the other hand, 20 is the very opposite to this ; in Luther there is nothing Greek or pagan ; vehemently as he attacked the adoration of St. Francis, Luther had himself something of St. Francis in him ; he was a thousand times more akin to St. Francis than to Theocritus or to Voltaire. The Reformation—I do not mean the inferior piece given under that name, by Henry the Eighth and a second-rate company, in this island, but the real Reformation, the German Reformation, Luther's Reformation—was a reaction of the moral and 30 spiritual sense against the carnal and pagan sense ; it was a religious revival like St. Francis's, but this time against the Church of Rome, not within her ; for the carnal and pagan sense had now, in the government of the Church of Rome herself, its prime representative. But the grand reaction against the rule of the heart and imagination, the strong return towards the rule of the senses and understanding, is in the eighteenth century. And this reaction has had no more brilliant champion than a man of the nineteenth, of whom I have already spoken ; a man who could 40 feel not only the pleasurable but the poetry of the life of the senses (and the life of the senses has its deep poetry) ; a man who, in his very last poem, divided the whole world into 'barbarians and Greeks,'—Heinrich Heine. No man has reproached the Monte Alverno extreme in sentiment, the Christian extreme, the heart and imagination subjugating the senses and understanding, more bitterly than Heine ; no man has extolled the Pompeii extreme, the pagan extreme, more rapturously.

'All through the Middle Age these sufferings, this fever, this over-tension lasted ; and we moderns still feel in all our limbs the pain and weakness from them. Even those of us who are cured have still to live with a hospital-<sup>10</sup> atmosphere all around us, and find ourselves as wretched in it as a strong man among the sick. Some day or other, when humanity shall have got quite well again, when the body and soul shall have made their peace together, the factitious quarrel which Christianity has cooked up between them will appear something hardly comprehensible. The fairer and happier generations, offspring of unfettered unions, that will rise up and bloom in the atmosphere of a religion of pleasure, will smile sadly when they think of their poor ancestors, whose life was passed in melancholy<sup>20</sup> abstinence from the joys of this beautiful earth, and who faded away into spectres, from the mortal compression which they put upon the warm and glowing emotions of sense. Yes, with assurance I say it, our descendants will be fairer and happier than we are ; for I am a believer in progress, and I hold God to be a kind being who has intended man to be happy.'

That is Heine's sentiment, in the prime of life, in the glow of activity, amid the brilliant whirl of Paris. I will no more blame it than I blamed the sentiment of the<sup>30</sup> Greek hymn to Adonis. I wish to decide nothing as of my own authority ; the great art of criticism is to get oneself out of the way and to let humanity decide. Well, the sentiment of the 'religion of pleasure' has much that is natural in it ; humanity will gladly accept it if it can live by it ; to live by it one must never be sick or sorry, and the old, ideal, limited, pagan world never, I have said, was sick or sorry, never at least shows itself to us sick or sorry:—

'What pipes and timbrels ! what wild ecstasy !'

For our imagination, Gorgo and Praxinoe cross the human<sup>40</sup> stage chattering in their blithe Doric,—like turtles, as the cross stranger said,—and keep gaily chattering on till they disappear. But in the new, real, immense, post-pagan world,—in the barbarian world,—the shock of accident is unceasing, the serenity of existence is perpetually troubled, not even a Greek like Heine can get across the mortal stage without bitter calamity. How does the sentiment of the 'religion of pleasure' serve then? does it help, does it console? Can a man live by it? Heine again shall 10 answer; Heine just twenty years older, stricken with incurable disease, waiting for death:—

'The great pot stands smoking before me, but I have no spoon to help myself. What does it profit me that my health is drunk at banquets out of gold cups and in the most exquisite wines, if I myself, while these ovations are going on, lonely and cut off from the pleasures of the world, can only just wet my lips with barley-water? What good does it do me that all the roses of Shiraz open their leaves and burn for me with passionate tenderness?
 20 Alas! Shiraz is some two thousand leagues from the Rue d'Amsterdam, where in the solitude of my sick chamber all the perfume I smell is that of hot towels. Alas! the mockery of God is heavy upon me! The great author of the universe, the Aristophanes of Heaven, has determined to make the petty earthly author, the so-called Aristophanes of Germany, feel to his heart's core what pitiful needle-pricks his cleverest sarcasms have been, compared with the thunderbolts which his divine humour can launch against feeble mortals! . . .

30 'In the year 1340, says the Chronicle of Limburg, all over Germany everybody was strumming and humming certain songs more lovely and delightful than any which had ever yet been known in German countries; and all people, old and young, the women particularly, were perfectly mad about them, so that from morning till night you heard nothing else. Only, the Chronicle adds, the author of these songs happened to be a young clerk afflicted with leprosy, and living apart from all the world in a desolate place. The excellent reader does not require to plague were banished from society, and had to keep at a distance from every human being. Like living corpses, in a grey gown reaching down to the feet, and with the hood brought over their face, they went about, carrying in their hands an enormous rattle, called Saint Lazarus's rattle. With this rattle they gave notice of their approach, that every one might have time to get out of their way. This poor clerk, then, whose poetical gift the Limburg Chronicle extols, was a leper, and he sat moping in the dismal deserts of his misery, whilst all Germany, gay and 10 tuneful, was praising his songs.
 40 be told how horrible a complaint was leprosy in the Middle Ages, and how the poor wretches who had this incurable

' Sometimes, in my sombre visions of the night, I imagine that I see before me the poor leprosy-stricken clerk of the Limburg Chronicle, and then from under his grey hood his distressed eyes look out upon me in a fixed and strange fashion ; but the next instant he disappears, and I hear dying away in the distance, like the echo of a dream, the dull creak of Saint Lazarus's rattle.'

We have come a long way from Theocritus there ! the expression of that has nothing of the clear, positive, happy, 20 pagan character ; it has much more the character of one of the indeterminate grotesques of the suffering Middle Age. Profoundness and power it has, though at the same time it is not truly poetical ; it is not natural enough for that, there is too much waywardness in it, too much bravado. But as a condition of sentiment to be popular,—to be a comfort for the mass of mankind, under the pressure of calamity, to live by,—what a manifest failure is this last word of the religion of pleasure ! One man in many millions, a Heine, may console himself, and keep himself 30 erect in suffering, by a colossal irony of this sort, by covering himself and the universe with the red fire of this sinister mockery ; but the many millions cannot,—cannot if they would. That is where the sentiment of a religion of sorrow has such a vast advantage over the sentiment of a religion of pleasure ; in its power to be a general, popular, religious sentiment, a stay for the mass of mankind, whose lives are full of hardship. It really succeeds in conveying far more joy, far more of what the mass of mankind are so much without, than its rival. I do not mean joy in pros- 40 pect only, but joy in possession, actual enjoyment of the world. Mediaeval Christianity is reproached with its gloom and austerities ; it assigns the material world, says Heine, to the devil. But yet what a fulness of delight does St. Francis manage to draw from this material world itself, and from its commonest and most universally enjoyed elements,—sun, air, earth, water, plants ! His hymn expresses a far more cordial sense of happiness, even in the material world, than the hymn of Theocritus. It is this which made the fortune of Christianity,—its glad-10 ness, not its sorrow ; not its assigning the spiritual world to Christ and the material world to the devil, but its drawing from the spiritual world a source of joy so abundant that it ran over upon the material world and transfigured it.

I have said a great deal of harm of paganism ; and, taking paganism to mean a state of things which it is commonly taken to mean, and which did really exist, no more harm than it well deserved. Yet I must not end without reminding the reader, that before this state of 20 things appeared, there was an epoch in Greek life—in pagan life—of the highest possible beauty and value ; an epoch which alone goes far towards making Greece the Greece we mean when we speak of Greece,—a country hardly less important to mankind than Judaea. The poetry of later paganism lived by the senses and understanding ; the poetry of mediaeval Christianity lived by the heart and imagination. But the main element of the modern spirit's life is neither the senses and understanding, nor the heart and imagination ; it is the imaginative reason.
 30 And there is a century in Greek life,—the century preceding the Peloponnesian war, from about the year 530 B. C. to about the year 430,—in which poetry made, it seems to me, the noblest, the most successful effort she has ever made as the priestess of the imaginative reason, of the element by which the modern spirit, if it would live right, has chiefly to live. Of this effort, of which the four great names are Simonides, Pindar, Aeschylus, Sophocles, I must not now attempt more than the bare mention ; but it is right, it is necessary, after all I have said, to indicate it.
 40 No doubt that effort was imperfect. Perhaps everything, take it at what point in its existence you will, carries within itself, the fatal law of its own ulterior development. Perhaps, even of the life of Pindar's time, Pompeii was the inevitable bourne. Perhaps the life of their beautiful Greece could not afford to its poets all that fulness of varied experience, all that power of emotion, which affords to the poet of after-times. Perhaps in Sophocles the thinking-power a little overbalances the religious sense, as in Dante the religious sense overbalances the thinking-<sup>10</sup> power. The present has to make its own poetry, and not even Sophocles and his compeers, any more than Dante and Shakspeare, are enough for it. That I will not dispute; nor will I set up the Greek poets, from Pindar to Sophocles, as objects of blind worship. But no other poets so well show to the poetry of the present the way it must take; no other poets have lived so much by the imaginative reason; no other poets have made their work so well balanced; no other poets, who have so well satisfied the thinking-power, have so well satisfied the religious<sup>20</sup> sense :—

ARNOLD

M

‘ . . . the heavy and the weary weight
Of all this unintelligible world ’

‘ Oh! that my lot may lead me in the path of holy innocence of word and deed, the path which august laws ordain, laws that in the highest empyrean had their birth, of which Heaven is the father alone, neither did the race of mortal men beget them, nor shall oblivion ever put them to sleep. The power of God is mighty in them, and groweth not old.’

Let St. Francis—nay, or Luther either—beat that!

JOUBERT

WHY should we ever treat of any dead authors but the famous ones ? Mainly for this reason : because, from these famous personages, home or foreign, whom we all know so well, and of whom so much has been said, the amount of stimulus which they contain for us has been in a great measure disengaged ; people have formed their opinion about them, and do not readily change it. One may write of them afresh, combat received opinions about them, even interest one's readers in so doing ; but the interest
10 one's readers receive has to do, in general, rather with the treatment than with the subject ; they are susceptible of a lively impression rather of the course of the discussion itself,—its turns, vivacity, and novelty,—than of the genius of the author who is the occasion of it. And yet what is really precious and inspiring, in all that we get from literature, except this sense of an immediate contact with genius itself, and the stimulus towards what is true and excellent which we derive from it ? Now in literature, besides the eminent men of genius who have had their 20 deserts in the way of fame, besides the eminent men of ability who have often had far more than their deserts in the way of fame, there are a certain number of personages who have been real men of genius,—by which I mean, that they have had a genuine gift for what is true and excellent, and are therefore capable of emitting a life-giving stimulus,—but who, for some reason or other, in most cases for very valid reasons, have remained obscure, nay, beyond a narrow circle in their own country, unknown. It is salutary from time to time to come across a genius of 30 this kind, and to extract his honey. Often he has more of it for us, as I have already said, than greater men ; for, though it is by no means true that from what is new to us there is most to be learnt, it is yet indisputably true that from what is new to us we in general learn most.

Of a genius of this kind, Joseph Joubert, I am now going to speak. His name is, I believe, almost unknown in England; and even in France, his native country, it is not famous. M. Sainte-Beuve has given of him one of his incomparable portraits; but,—besides that even M. Sainte-Beuve's writings are far less known amongst us than they deserve to be,—every country has its own point of view from which a remarkable author may most profitably be seen and studied.

Joseph Joubert was born (and his date should be re-<sup>10</sup> marked) in 1754, at Montignac, a little town in Périgord. His father was a doctor with small means and a large family; and Joseph, the eldest, had his own way to make in the world. He was for eight years, as pupil first, and afterwards as an assistant-master, in the public school of Toulouse, then managed by the Jesuits, who seem to have left in him a most favourable opinion, not only of their tact and address, but of their really good qualities as teachers and directors. Compelled by the weakness of his health to give up, at twenty-two, the profession of<sup>20</sup> teaching, he passed two important years of his life in hard study, at home at Montignac; and came in 1778 to try his fortune in the literary world of Paris, then perhaps the most tempting field which has ever yet presented itself to a young man of letters. He knew Diderot, D'Alembert, Marmontel, Laharpe; he became intimate with one of the celebrities of the next literary generation, then, like himself, a young man,—Chateaubriand's friend, the future Grand Master of the University, Fontanes. But, even then, it began to be remarked of him, that M. Joubert s'inquiétait<sup>30</sup> de perfection bien plus que de gloire—'cared far more about perfecting himself than about making himself a reputation.' His severity of morals may perhaps have been rendered easier to him by the delicacy of his health; but the delicacy of his health will not by itself account for his changeless preference of being to seeming, knowing to showing, studying to publishing; for what terrible public performers have some invalids been! This preference he retained all through his life, and it is by this that he is characterised. 'He has chosen,' Chateaubriand (adopting<sup>40</sup> Epicurus's famous words) said of him, 'to hide his life.'

Of a life which its owner was bent on hiding there can be but little to tell. Yet the only two public incidents of Joubert's life, slight as they are, do all concerned in them so much credit that they deserve mention. In 1790 the Constituent Assembly made the office of justice of the peace elective throughout France. The people of Montignac retained such an impression of the character of their young townsman,—one of Plutarch's men of virtue, as he had lived amongst them, simple, studious, severe,—that,
10 though he had left them for years, they elected him in his absence without his knowing anything about it. The appointment little suited Joubert's wishes or tastes; but at such a moment he thought it wrong to decline it. He held it for two years, the legal term, discharging its duties with a firmness and integrity which were long remembered; and then, when he went out of office, his fellow-townsmen re-elected him. But Joubert thought that he had now accomplished his duty towards them, and he went back to the retirement which he loved. That seems to us 20 a little episode of the great French Revolution worth remembering. The sage who was asked by the king, why sages were seen at the doors of kings, but not kings at the doors of sages, replied, that it was because sages knew what was good for them, and kings did not. But at Montignac the king—for in 1790 the people in France was king with a vengeance—knew what was good for him, and came to the door of the sage.

The other incident was this. When Napoleon, in 1809, reorganised the public instruction of France, founded the 30 University, and made M. de Fontanes its Grand Master, Fontanes had to submit to the Emperor a list of persons to form the council or governing body of the new University. Third on his list, after two distinguished names, Fontanes placed the unknown name of Joubert. 'This name,' he said in his accompanying memorandum to the Emperor, 'is not known as the two first are; and yet this is the nomination to which I attach most importance. I have known M. Joubert all my life. His character and intelligence are of the very highest order. I shall rejoice if your 40 Majesty will accept my guarantee for him.' Napoleon trusted his Grand Master, and Joubert became a councillor of the University. It is something that a man, elevated to the highest posts of State, should not forget his obscure friends ; or that, if he remembers and places them, he should regard in placing them their merit rather than their obscurity. It is more, in the eyes of those whom the necessities, real or supposed, of a political system have long familiarised with such cynical disregard of fitness in the distribution of office, to see a minister and his master alike zealous, in giving away places, to give them to the best men to be found. 10

Between 1792 and 1809 Joubert had married. His life was passed between Villeneuve-sur-Yonne, where his wife's family lived,—a pretty little Burgundian town, by which the Lyons railroad now passes,—and Paris. Here, in a house in the Rue St.-Honoré, in a room very high up, and admitting plenty of the light which he so loved,—a room from which he saw, in his own words, 'a great deal of sky and very little earth,'—among the treasures of a library collected with infinite pains, taste, and skill, from which every book he thought ill of was rigidly ex- 20cluded,—he never would possess either a complete Voltaire or a complete Rousseau,—the happiest hours of his life were passed. In the circle of one of those women who leave a sort of perfume in literary history, and who have the gift of inspiring successive generations of readers with an indescribable regret not to have known them,—Pauline de Montmorin, Madame de Beaumont,—he had become intimate with nearly all which at that time, in the Paris world of letters or of society, was most attractive and promising. Amongst his acquaintances one only misses 30 the names of Madame de Staël and Benjamin Constant ; neither of them was to his taste, and with Madame de Staël he always refused to become acquainted ; he thought she had more vehemence than truth, and more heat than light. Years went on, and his friends became conspicuous authors or statesmen ; but Joubert remained in the shade. His constitution was of such fragility that how he lived so long, or accomplished so much as he did, is a wonder ; his soul had, for its basis of operations, hardly any body at all : both from his stomach and from his chest he seems 40 to have had constant suffering, though he lived by rule, and was as abstemious as a Hindoo. Often, after over-work in thinking, reading, or talking, he remained for days together in a state of utter prostration,—condemned to absolute silence and inaction; too happy if the agitation of his mind would become quiet also, and let him have the repose of which he stood in so much need. With this weakness of health, these repeated suspensions of energy, he was incapable of the prolonged contention of spirit necessary for the creation of great works; but he read 10 and thought immensely; he was an unwearied note-taker, a charming letter-writer; above all, an excellent and delightful talker. The gaiety and amenity of his natural disposition were inexhaustible; and his spirit, too, was of astonishing elasticity; he seemed to hold on to life by a single thread only, but that single thread was very tenacious. More and more, as his soul and knowledge ripened more and more, his friends pressed to his room in the Rue St.-Honoré; often he received them in bed, for 20 he seldom rose before three o'clock in the afternoon; and at his bedroom-door, on his bad days, Madame Joubert stood sentry, trying, not always with success, to keep back the thirsty comers from the fountain which was forbidden to flow. Fontanes did nothing in the University without consulting him, and Joubert's ideas and pen were always at his friend's service. When he was in the country, at Villeneuve, the young priests of his neighbourhood used to resort to him, in order to profit by his library and by his conversation. He, like our Coleridge, was particularly qualified to attract men of this kind and to benefit them:

30 retaining perfect independence of mind, he was religious; he was a religious philosopher. As age came on, his infirmities became more and more overwhelming; some of his friends, too, died; others became so immersed in politics, that Joubert, who hated politics, saw them seldomer than of old; but the moroseness of age and infirmity never touched him, and he never quarrelled with a friend or lost one. From these miseries he was preserved by that quality in him of which I have already spoken; a quality which is best expressed by a word, not of common 40 use in English,—alas, we have too little in our national character of the quality which this word expresses,—his inborn, his constant amenity. He lived till the year 1824. On the 4th of May in that year he died, at the age of seventy. A day or two after his death, M. de Chateaubriand inserted in the Journal des Débats a short notice of him, perfect for its feeling, grace, and propriety. On ne vit dans la mémoire du monde, he says and says truly, que par des travaux pour le monde—‘a man can live in the world’s memory only by what he has done for the world.’ But Chateaubriand used the privilege which his great name gave him to assert, delicately but firmly, Joubert’s real 10 and rare merits, and to tell the world what manner of man had just left it.

Joubert’s papers were accumulated in boxes and drawers. He had not meant them for publication; it was very difficult to sort them and to prepare them for it. Madame Joubert, his widow, had a scruple about giving them a publicity which her husband, she felt, would never have permitted. But, as her own end approached, the natural desire to leave of so remarkable a spirit some enduring 20 memorial, some memorial to outlast the admiring recollection of the living who were so fast passing away, made her yield to the entreaties of his friends, and allow the printing, but for private circulation only, of a volume of his fragments. Chateaubriand edited it; it appeared in 1838, fourteen years after Joubert’s death. The volume attracted the attention of those who were best fitted to appreciate it, and profoundly impressed them. M. Sainte-Beuve gave of it, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, the admirable notice of which I have already spoken; and so much curiosity was excited about Joubert, that the collection of his frag- 30 ments, enlarged by many additions, was at last published for the benefit of the world in general. It has since been twice reprinted. The first or preliminary chapter has some fancifulness and affectation in it; the reader should begin with the second.

I have likened Joubert to Coleridge; and indeed the points of resemblance between the two men are numerous. Both of them great and celebrated talkers, Joubert attracting pilgrims to his upper chamber in the Rue St.-Honoré, as Coleridge attracted pilgrims to Mr. Gilman’s at High- 40 gate; both of them desultory and incomplete writers,— here they had an outward likeness with one another. Both of them passionately devoted to reading in a class of books, and to thinking on a class of subjects, out of the beaten line of the reading and thought of their day ; both of them ardent students and critics of old literature, poetry, and the metaphysics of religion ; both of them curious explorers of words, and of the latent significance hidden under the popular use of them ; both of them, in a certain sense, conservative in religion and politics, by antipathy to 10 the narrow and shallow foolishness of vulgar modern liberalism ;—here they had their inward and real likeness. But that in which the essence of their likeness consisted is this,—that they both had from nature an ardent impulse for seeking the genuine truth on all matters they thought about, and a gift for finding it and recognising it when it was found. To have the impulse for seeking this truth is much rarer than most people think ; to have the gift for finding it is, I need not say, very rare indeed. By this they have a spiritual relationship of the closest kind with 20 one another, and they become, each of them, a source of stimulus and progress for all of us.

Coleridge had less delicacy and penetration than Joubert, but more richness and power ; his production, though far inferior to what his nature at first seemed to promise, was abundant and varied. Yet in all his production how much is there to dissatisfy us ! How many reserves must be made in praising either his poetry, or his criticism, or his philosophy ! How little either of his poetry, or of his criticism, or of his philosophy, can we expect permanently 30 to stand ! But that which will stand of Coleridge is this : the stimulus of his continual effort,—not a moral effort, for he had no morals,—but of his continual instinctive effort, crowned often with rich success, to get at and to lay bare the real truth of his matter in hand, whether that matter were literary, or philosophical, or political, or religious ; and this in a country where at that moment such an effort was almost unknown ; where the most powerful minds threw themselves upon poetry, which conveys truth, indeed, but conveys it indirectly ; and where ordinary convenience as paramount, that any attempt to introduce within the domain of these the disturbing element of thought, they were prompt to resent as an outrage. Coleridge's great action lay in his supplying in England, for many years and under critical circumstances, by the spectacle of this effort of his, a stimulus to all minds, in the generation which grew up round him, capable of profiting by it. His action will still be felt as long as the need for it continues ; when, with the cessation of the need, the action too has ceased, Coleridge's memory, in spite of 10 the disesteem—nay, repugnance—which his character may and must inspire, will yet for ever remain invested with that interest and gratitude which invests the memory of founders.
40 minds were so habituated to do without thinking altogether, to regard considerations of established routine and practical

M. de Rémusat, indeed, reproaches Coleridge with his jugements saugrenus ; the criticism of a gifted truth-finder ought not to be saugrenu ; so on this reproach we must pause for a moment. Saugrenu is a rather vulgar French word, but, like many other vulgar words, very expressive ; used as an epithet for a judgment, it means 20 something like impudently absurd. The literary judgments of one nation about another are very apt to be saugrenus ; it is certainly true, as M. Sainte-Beuve remarks in answer to Goethe's complaint against the French that they have undervalued Du Bartas, that as to the estimate of its own authors every nation is the best judge ; the positive estimate of them, be it understood, not, of course, the estimate of them in comparison with the authors of other nations. Therefore a foreigner's judgments about the intrinsic merit of a nation's authors will generally, 30 when at complete variance with that nation's own, be wrong ; but there is a permissible wrongness in these matters, and to that permissible wrongness there is a limit. When that limit is exceeded, the wrong judgment becomes more than wrong, it becomes saugrenu, or impudently absurd. For instance, the high estimate which the French have of Racine is probably in great measure deserved ; or, to take a yet stronger case, even the high estimate which Joubert had of the Abbé Delille is probably in great measure deserved ; but the common disparaging judg- 40 ment passed on Racine by English readers is not saugrenu, still less is that passed by them on the Abbé Delille sau- grenu, because the beauty of Racine, and of Delille too, so far as Delille's beauty goes, is eminently in their language, and this is a beauty which a foreigner cannot perfectly seize ;—this beauty of diction, apicibus verborum ligata, as

 M. Sainte-Beuve, quoting Quintilian, says of Chateaubriand's.
 As to Chateaubriand himself, again, the common English judgment, which stamps him as a mere shallow rhetorician, all froth and vanity, is certainly wrong ; one 10 may even wonder that we English should judge Chateaubriand so wrongly, for his power goes far beyond beauty of diction ; it is a power, as well, of passion and sentiment, and this sort of power the English can perfectly well appreciate. One production of Chateaubriand's, René, is akin to the most popular productions of Byron,—to the Childe Harold or Manfred,—in spirit, equal to them in power, superior to them in form. But this work, I hardly know why, is almost unread in England. And only consider this criticism of Chateaubriand's on the true pathetic !
 20 ' It is a dangerous mistake, sanctioned, like so many other dangerous mistakes, by Voltaire, to suppose that the best works of imagination are those which draw most tears.
 One could name this or that melodrama, which no one would like to own having written, and which yet harrows the feelings far more than the Aeneid. The true tears are those which are called forth by the beauty of poetry ;
 there must be as much admiration in them as sorrow.
 They are the tears which come to our eyes when Priam says to Achilles, ἔτλην δ', οἷ' οὖπω . . .—“ And I have 30 endured,—the like whereof no soul upon the earth hath yet endured,—to carry to my lips the hand of him who slew my child ;” or when Joseph cries out : “ I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt.” ’ Who does not feel that the man who wrote that was no shallow rhetorician, but a born man of genius, with the true instinct of genius for what is really admirable ? Nay, take these words of Chateaubriand, an old man of eighty, dying amidst the noise and bustle of the ignoble revolution of February 1848 : ‘ Mon Dieu, mon Dieu, quand donc, quand donc 40 serai-je délivré de tout ce monde, ce bruit ; quand donc, quand donc cela finira-t-il ? ’ Who, with any ear, does not feel that those are not the accents of a trumpery rhetorician, but of a rich and puissant nature,—the cry of the dying lion? I repeat it, Chateaubriand is most ignorantly underrated in England; and we English are capable of rating him far more correctly if we knew him better. Still, Chateaubriand has such real and great faults, he falls so decidedly beneath the rank of the truly greatest authors, that the depreciatory judgment passed on him in England, though ignorant and wrong, can hardly be said to transgress the limits of permissible ignorance; it is not a jugement saugrenu. But when a critic denies genius to a literature which has produced Bossuet and Molière, he passes the bounds; and Coleridge's judgments on French literature and the French genius are undoubtedly, as M. de Rémusat calls them, saugrenus.

And yet, such is the impetuosity of our poor human nature, such its proneness to rush to a decision with imperfect knowledge, that his having delivered a saugrenu judgment or two in his life by no means proves a man not to have had, in comparison with his fellow men in general, a remarkable gift for truth, or disqualifies him for being, by virtue of that gift, a source of vital stimulus for us. Joubert had far less smoke and turbid vehemence in him than Coleridge; he had also a far keener sense of what was absurd. But Joubert can write to M. Molé (the M. Molé who was afterwards Louis Philippe's well-known minister): 'As to your Milton, whom the merit of the Abbé Delille' (the Abbé Delille translated Paradise Lost) 'makes me admire, and with whom I have nevertheless still plenty of fault to find, why, I should like to know, are you scandalised that I have not enabled myself to read him? I don't understand the language in which he writes, and I don't much care to. If he is a poet one cannot put up with, even in the prose of the younger Racine, am I to blame for that? If by force you mean beauty manifesting itself with power, I maintain that the Abbé Delille has more force than Milton.' That, to be sure, is a petulant outburst in a private letter; it is not, like Coleridge's, a deliberate proposition in a printed philosophical essay. But is it possible to imagine a more perfect specimen of a saugrenu judgment? It is even worse than Coleridge's, because it is saugrenu with reasons. That, however, does not prevent Joubert from having been really a man of extraordinary ardour in the search for truth, and of extraordinary fineness in the perception of it; and so was Coleridge.

Joubert had around him in France an atmosphere of literary, philosophical, and religious opinion as alien to him as that in England was to Coleridge. This is what makes Joubert, too, so remarkable, and it is on this account 10 that I begged the reader to remark his date. He was born in 1754; he died in 1824. He was thus in the fulness of his powers at the beginning of the present century, at the epoch of Napoleon's consulate. The French criticism of that day—the criticism of Laharpe's successors, of Geoffroy and his colleagues in the Journal des Débats—had a dryness very unlike the telling vivacity of the early Edinburgh reviewers, their contemporaries, but a fundamental narrowness, a want of genuine insight, much on a par with theirs. Joubert, like Coleridge, has no respect for the dominant 20 oracle; he treats his Geoffroy with about as little deference as Coleridge treats his Jeffrey. 'Geoffroy,' he says of an article in the Journal des Débats criticising Chateaubriand's Génie du Christianisme—'Geoffroy in this article begins by holding out his paw prettily enough; but he ends by a volley of kicks, which lets the whole world see but too clearly the four iron shoes of the four-footed animal.' There is, however, in France a sympathy with intellectual activity for its own sake, and for the sake of its inherent pleasureableness and beauty, keener than any which exists
 30 in England; and Joubert had more effect in Paris,—though his conversation was his only weapon, and Coleridge wielded besides his conversation his pen,—than Coleridge had or could have in London. I mean, a more immediate, appreciable effect; an effect not only upon the young and enthusiastic, to whom the future belongs, but upon formed and important personages to whom the present belongs, and who are actually moving society. He owed this partly to his real advantages over Coleridge. If he had, as I have already said, less power and richness than his English 40 parallel, he had more tact and penetration. He was more possible than Coleridge; his doctrine was more intelligible than Coleridge's, more receivable. And yet with Joubert, the striving after a consummate and attractive clearness of expression came from no mere frivolous dislike of labour and inability for going deep, but was a part of his native love of truth and perfection. The delight of his life he found in truth, and in the satisfaction which the enjoying of truth gives to the spirit; and he thought the truth was never really and worthily said, so long as the least cloud, clumsiness, and repulsiveness hung about the expression of it.

10

Some of his best passages are those in which he upholds this doctrine. Even metaphysics he would not allow to remain difficult and abstract; so long as they spoke a professional jargon, the language of the schools, he maintained,—and who shall gainsay him?—that metaphysics were imperfect; or, at any rate, had not yet reached their ideal perfection.

'The true science of metaphysics,' he says, 'consists not in rendering abstract that which is sensible, but in rendering sensible that which is abstract; apparent that which is hidden; imaginable, if so it may be, that which is only intelligible; and intelligible, finally, that which an ordinary attention fails to seize.'

And therefore:—

'Distrust, in books on metaphysics, words which have not been able to get currency in the world, and are only calculated to form a special language.'

Nor would he suffer common words to be employed in a special sense by the schools:—

'Which is the best, if one wants to be useful and to be really understood, to get one's words in the world, or to get them in the schools? I maintain that the good plan is to employ words in their popular sense rather than in their philosophical sense; and the better plan still, to employ them in their natural sense rather than in their popular sense. By their natural sense, I mean the popular and universal acceptance of them brought to that which in this is essential and invariable. To prove a thing by definition proves nothing, if the definition is purely philosophical; for such definitions only bind him who makes them. To prove a thing by definition, when the definition expresses the necessary, inevitable, and clear idea which the world at large attaches to the object, is, on the contrary, all in all ; because then what one does is simply to show people what they do really think, in spite of themselves and without knowing it. The rule that one is free to give to words what sense one will, and that the only thing needful is to be agreed upon the sense one gives them, is very well for the mere purposes of argumentation, and may be allowed in the schools where this sort of fencing is to be 10 practised ; but in the sphere of the true-born and noble science of metaphysics, and in the genuine world of literature, it is good for nothing. One must never quit sight of realities, and one must employ one's expressions simply as media,—as glasses, through which one's thoughts can be best made evident. I know, by my own experience, how hard this rule is to follow ; but I judge of its importance by the failure of every system of metaphysics. Not one of them has succeeded ; for the simple reason, that in every one ciphers have been constantly used instead of values, 20 artificial ideas instead of native ideas, jargon instead of idiom.'

I do not know whether the metaphysician will ever adopt Joubert's rules ; but I am sure that the man of letters, whenever he has to speak of metaphysics, will do well to adopt them. He, at any rate, must remember :—

' It is by means of familiar words that style takes hold of the reader and gets possession of him. It is by means of these that great thoughts get currency and pass for true metal, like gold and silver which have had a recognised 30 stamp put upon them. They beget confidence in the man who, in order to make his thoughts more clearly perceived, uses them ; for people feel that such an employment of the language of common human life betokens a man who knows that life and its concerns, and who keeps himself in contact with them. Besides, these words make a style frank and easy. They show that an author has long made the thought or the feeling expressed his mental food ; that he has so assimilated them and familiarised them, that the most common expressions suffice him in order to express 40 ideas which have become everyday ideas to him by the length of time they have been in his mind. And lastly, what one says in such words looks more true ; for, of all the words in use, none are so clear as those which we call common words ; and clearness is so eminently one of the characteristics of truth, that often it even passes for truth itself.'

These are not, in Joubert, mere counsels of rhetoric ; they come from his accurate sense of perfection, from his having clearly seized the fine and just idea that beauty and light are properties of truth, and that truth is incompletely exhibited if it is exhibited without beauty and light :—

'Be profound with clear terms and not with obscure terms. What is difficult will at last become easy ; but as one goes deep into things, one must still keep a charm, and one must carry into these dark depths of thought, into which speculation has only recently penetrated, the pure and antique clearness of centuries less learned than ours, but with more light in them.'

And elsewhere he speaks of those 'spirits, lovers of light, who, when they have an idea to put forth, brood <sup>20</sup> long over it first, and wait patiently till it shines, as Buffon enjoined, when he defined genius to be the aptitude for patience ; spirits who know by experience that the driest matter and the dullest words hide within them the germ and spark of some brightness, like those fairy nuts in which were found diamonds if one broke the shell and was the right person ; spirits who maintain that, to see and exhibit things in beauty, is to see and show things as in their essence they really are, and not as they exist for the eye of the careless, who do not look beyond the <sup>30</sup> outside ; spirits hard to satisfy, because of a keen-sightedness in them, which makes them discern but too clearly both the models to be followed and those to be shunned ; spirits active though meditative, who cannot rest except in solid truths, and whom only beauty can make happy ; spirits far less concerned for glory than for perfection, who, because their art is long and life is short, often die without leaving a monument, having had their own inward sense of life and fruitfulness for their best reward.'

No doubt there is something a little too ethereal in all <sup>40</sup> this, something which reminds one of Joubert's physical want of body and substance ; no doubt, if a man wishes to be a great author, it is 'to consider too curiously, to consider' as Joubert did ; it is a mistake to spend so much of one's time in setting up one's ideal standard of perfection, and in contemplating it. Joubert himself knew this very well : 'I cannot build a house for my ideas,' said he ; 'I have tried to do without words, and words take their revenge on me by their difficulty.' 'If there is a man upon earth tormented by the cursed desire to get a whole book 10 into a page, a whole page into a phrase, and this phrase into one word,—that man is myself.' 'I can sow, but I cannot build.' Joubert, however, makes no claim to be a great author ; by renouncing all ambition to be this, by not trying to fit his ideas into a house, by making no compromise with words in spite of their difficulty, by being quite single-minded in his pursuit of perfection, perhaps he is enabled to get closer to the truth of the objects of his study, and to be of more service to us by setting ideals, 20 whether, in an elaborate work on the philosophy of religion, he would have got his ideas about religion to shine, to use his own expression, as they shine when he utters them in perfect freedom. Penetration in these matters is valueless without soul, and soul is valueless without penetration ; both of these are delicate qualities, and, even in those who have them, easily lost ; the charm of Joubert is, that he has and keeps both :—

'One should be fearful of being wrong in poetry when one thinks differently from the poets, and in religion when 30 one thinks differently from the saints.

'There is a great difference between taking for idols Mahomet and Luther, and bowing down before Rousseau and Voltaire. People at any rate imagined they were obeying God when they followed Mahomet, and the Scriptures when they hearkened to Luther. And perhaps one ought not too much to disparage that inclination which leads mankind to put into the hands of those whom it thinks the friends of God the direction and government of its heart and mind. It is the subjection 40 to irreligious spirits which alone is fatal, and, in the fullest sense of the word, depraving.

ARNOLD

N

‘ May I say it ? It is not hard to know God, provided one will not force oneself to define him.

‘ Do not bring into the domain of reasoning that which belongs to our innermost feeling. State truths of sentiment, and do not try to prove them. There is a danger in such proofs ; for in arguing it is necessary to treat that which is in question as something problematic : now that which we accustom ourselves to treat as problematic ends by appearing to us as really doubtful. In things that are visible and palpable, never prove what is believed 10 already ; in things that are certain and mysterious,—mysterious by their greatness and by their nature,—make people believe them, and do not prove them ; in things that are matters of practice and duty, command, and do not explain. “ Fear God,” has made many men pious ; the proofs of the existence of God have made many men atheists. From the defence springs the attack ; the advocate begets in his hearer a wish to pick holes ; and men are almost always led on, from the desire to contradict the doctor, to the desire to contradict the doctrine. 20 Make truth lovely, and do not try to arm her ; mankind will then be far less inclined to contend with her.

‘ Why is even a bad preacher almost always heard by the pious with pleasure ? Because he talks to them about what they love. But you who have to expound religion to the children of this world, you who have to speak to them of that which they once loved perhaps, or which they would be glad to love,—remember that they do not love it yet, and, to make them love it, take heed to speak with power. 30

‘ You may do what you like, mankind will believe no one but God ; and he only can persuade mankind who believes that God has spoken to him. No one can give faith unless he has faith ; the persuaded persuade, as the indulgent disarm.

‘ The only happy people in the world are the good man, the sage, and the saint ; but the saint is happier than either of the others, so much is man by his nature formed for sanctity.’

The same delicacy and penetration which he here shows 40 in speaking of the inward essence of religion, Joubert shows also in speaking of its outward form, and of its manifestation in the world :—

‘Piety is not a religion, though it is the soul of all religions. A man has not a religion simply by having pious inclinations, any more than he has a country simply by having philanthropy. A man has not a country until he is a citizen in a state, until he undertakes to follow and uphold certain laws, to obey certain magistrates, and to adopt certain ways of living and acting.

10 ‘Religion is neither a theology nor a theosophy ; it is more than all this ; it is a discipline, a law, a yoke, an indissoluble engagement.’

Who, again, has ever shown with more truth and beauty the good and imposing side of the wealth and splendour of the Catholic Church, than Joubert in the following passage :—

‘The pomps and magnificence with which the Church is reproached are in truth the result and the proof of her incomparable excellence. From whence, let me ask,
20 have come this power of hers and these excessive riches, except from the enchantment into which she threw all the world ? Ravished with her beauty, millions of men from age to age kept loading her with gifts, bequests, cessions. She had the talent of making herself loved, and the talent of making men happy. It is that which wrought prodigies for her ; it is from thence that she drew her power.’

‘She had the talent of making herself feared,’—one should add that too, in order to be perfectly just ; but 30 Joubert, because he is a true child of light, can see that the wonderful success of the Catholic Church must have been due really to her good rather than to her bad qualities ; to her making herself loved rather than to her making herself feared.

How striking and suggestive, again, is this remark on the Old and New Testaments :—

‘The Old Testament teaches the knowledge of good and evil ; the Gospel, on the other hand, seems written for the predestinated ; it is the book of innocence. The 40 one is made for earth, the other seems made for heaven. According as the one or the other of these books takes hold of a nation, what may be called the religious humours of nations differ.'

So the British and North American Puritans are the children of the Old Testament, as Joachim of Flora and St. Francis are the children of the New. And does not the following maxim exactly fit the Church of England, of which Joubert certainly never thought when he was writing it? 'The austere sects excite the most enthusiasm at first; but the temperate sects have always been the most durable.'

10

And these remarks on the Jansenists and Jesuits, interesting in themselves, are still more interesting because they touch matters we cannot well know at first hand, and which Joubert, an impartial observer, had had the means of studying closely. We are apt to think of the Jansenists as having failed by reason of their merits; Joubert shows us how far their failure was due to their defects:—

'We ought to lay stress upon what is clear in Scripture, and to pass quickly over what is obscure; to light up what in Scripture is troubled, by what is serene in it; what puzzles and checks the reason, by what satisfies the reason. The Jansenists have done just the reverse. They lay stress upon what is uncertain, obscure, afflicting, and they pass lightly over all the rest; they eclipse the luminous and consoling truths of Scripture, by putting between us and them its opaque and dismal truths. For example, "Many are called;" there is a clear truth: "Few are chosen;" there is an obscure truth. "We are children of wrath;" there is a sombre, cloudy, terrifying truth: "We are all the children of God;" "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance;" there are truths which are full of clearness, mildness, serenity, light. The Jansenists trouble our cheerfulness, and shed no cheering ray on our trouble. They are not, however, to be condemned for what they say, because what they say is true; but they are to be condemned for what they fail to say, for that is true too,—truer, even, than the other; that is, its truth is easier for us to seize, fuller, rounder, and more complete. Theology, as the Jansenists exhibit her, has but the half of her disk.'

Again :—

‘The Jansenists erect “grace” into a kind of fourth person of the Trinity. They are, without thinking or intending it, Quaternitarians. St. Paul and St. Augustine, too exclusively studied, have done all the mischief. Instead of “grace”, say help, succour, a divine influence, a dew of heaven; then one can come to a right understanding. The word “grace” is a sort of talisman, all the baneful spell of which can be broken by translating it. The trick of 10 personifying words is a fatal source of mischief in theology.’

Once more :—

‘The Jansenists tell men to love God; the Jesuits make men love him. The doctrine of these last is full of loosenesses, or, if you will, of errors; still,—singular as it may seem, it is undeniable,—they are the better directors of souls.

‘The Jansenists have carried into religion more thought than the Jesuits, and they go deeper; they are faster bound with its sacred bonds. They have in their way of thinking 20 an austerity which incessantly constrains the will to keep the path of duty; all the habits of their understanding, in short, are more Christian. But they seem to love God without affection, and solely from reason, from duty, from justice. The Jesuits, on the other hand, seem to love him from pure inclination; out of admiration, gratitude, tenderness; for the pleasure of loving him, in short. In their books of devotion you find joy, because with the Jesuits nature and religion go hand in hand. In the books of the Jansenists there is a sadness and a moral constraint, 30 because with the Jansenists religion is for ever trying to put nature in bonds.’

The Jesuits have suffered, and deservedly suffered, plenty of discredit from what Joubert gently calls their ‘loosenesses’; let them have the merit of their amiability.

The most characteristic thoughts one can quote from any writer are always his thoughts on matters like these; but the maxims of Joubert on purely literary subjects also, have the same purged and subtle delicacy; they show the same sedulousness in him to preserve perfectly true 40 the balance of his soul. Let me begin with this, which contains a truth too many people fail to perceive :—

'Ignorance, which in matters of morals extenuates the crime, is itself, in matters of literature, a crime of the first order.'

And here is another sentence, worthy of Goethe, to clear the air at one's entrance into the region of literature :—

'With the fever of the senses, the delirium of the passions, the weakness of the spirit ; with the storms of the passing time and with the great scourges of human life,—hunger, thirst, dishonour, diseases, and death,—<sup>10</sup> authors may as long as they like go on making novels which shall harrow our hearts ; but the soul says all the while, " You hurt me." '

And again :—

'Fiction has no business to exist unless it is more beautiful than reality. Certainly the monstrosities of fiction may be found in the booksellers' shops ; you buy them there for a certain number of francs, and you talk of them for a certain number of days ; but they have no place in literature, because in literature the one aim of <sup>20</sup> art is the beautiful. Once lose sight of that, and you have the mere frightful reality.'

That is just the right criticism to pass on these ' monstrosities ' ; they have no place in literature, and those who produce them are not really men of letters. One would think that this was enough to deter from such production any man of genuine ambition. But most of us, alas ! are what we must be, not what we ought to be, —not even what we know we ought to be.

The following, of which the first part reminds one of <sup>30</sup> Wordsworth's sonnet, ' If thou indeed derive thy light from heaven,' excellently defines the true salutary function of literature, and the limits of this function :—

'Whether one is an eagle or an ant, in the intellectual world, seems to me not to matter much ; the essential thing is to have one's place marked there, one's station assigned, and to belong decidedly to a regular and wholesome order. A small talent, if it keeps within its limits and rightly fulfils its task, may reach the goal just as well as a greater one. To accustom mankind to pleasures <sup>40</sup> which depend neither upon the bodily appetites nor upon money, by giving them a taste for the things of the mind, seems to me, in fact, the one proper fruit which nature has meant our literary productions to have. When they have other fruits, it is by accident, and, in general, not for good. Books which absorb our attention to such a degree that they rob us of all fancy for other books, are absolutely pernicious. In this way they only bring fresh crotchets and sects into the world ; they multiply the great variety of weights, rules, and measures already existing ; they are 10 morally and politically a nuisance.'

Who can read these words and not think of the limiting effect exercised by certain works in certain spheres and for certain periods ; exercised even by the works of men of genius or virtue,—by the works of Rousseau, the works of Wesley, the works of Swedenborg ? And what is it which makes the Bible so admirable a book, to be the one book of those who can have only one, but the miscellaneous character of the contents of the Bible ?

Joubert was all his life a passionate lover of Plato ; I 20 hope other lovers of Plato will forgive me for saying that their adored object has never been more truly described than he is here :—

' Plato shows us nothing, but he brings brightness with him ; he puts light into our eyes, and fills us with a clearness by which all objects afterwards become illuminated. He teaches us nothing ; but he prepares us, fashions us, and makes us ready to know all. Somehow or other, the habit of reading him augments in us the capacity for discerning and entertaining whatever fine truths may 30 afterwards present themselves. Like mountain-air, it sharpens our organs, and gives us an appetite for wholesome food.'

' Plato loses himself in the void ' (he says again) ; ' but one sees the play of his wings, one hears their rustle.' And the conclusion is : ' It is good to breathe his air, but not to live upon him.'

As a pendant to the criticism on Plato, this on the French moralist Nicole is excellent :—

' Nicole is a Pascal without style. It is not what he 40 says which is sublime, but what he thinks ; he rises, not by the natural elevation of his own spirit, but by that of his doctrines. One must not look to the form in him, but to the matter, which is exquisite. He ought to be read with a direct view of practice.'

English people have hardly ears to hear the praises of Bossuet, and the Bossuet of Joubert is Bossuet at his very best; but this is a far truer Bossuet than the 'declaimer' Bossuet of Lord Macaulay, himself a born rhetorician, if ever there was one:—

'Bossuet employs all our idioms, as Homer employed all the dialects. The language of kings, of statesmen, 10 and of warriors; the language of the people and of the student, of the country and of the schools, of the sanctuary and of the courts of law; the old and the new, the trivial and the stately, the quiet and the resounding,—he turns all to his use; and out of all this he makes a style, simple, grave, majestic. His ideas are, like his words, varied,—common and sublime together. Times and doctrines in all their multitude were ever before his spirit, as things and words in all their multitude were ever before it. He is not so much a man as a human nature, with the temper- 20 ance of a saint, the justice of a bishop, the prudence of a doctor, and the might of a great spirit.'

After this on Bossuet, I must quote a criticism on Racine, to show that Joubert did not indiscriminately worship all the French gods of the grand century:—

'Those who find Racine enough for them are poor souls and poor wits; they are souls and wits which have never got beyond the callow and boarding-school stage. Admirable, as no doubt he is, for his skill in having made poetical the most humdrum sentiments and the most 30 middling sort of passions, he can yet stand us in stead of nobody but himself. He is a superior writer; and, in literature, that at once puts a man on a pinnacle. But he is not an inimitable writer.'

And again: 'The talent of Racine is in his works, but Racine himself is not there. That is why he himself became disgusted with them.' 'Of Racine, as of his ancients, the genius lay in taste. His elegance is perfect, but it is not supreme, like that of Virgil.' And, indeed, there is something supreme in an elegance which exercises 40 such a fascination as Virgil's does; which makes one return to his poems again and again, long after one thinks one has done with them ; which makes them one of those books that, to use Joubert's words, ' lure the reader back to them, as the proverb says good wine lures back the wine-bibber.' And the highest praise Joubert can at last find for Racine is this, that he is the Virgil of the ignorant ;—

' Racine est le Virgile des ignorants.'

Of Boileau, too, Joubert says : ' Boileau is a powerful poet, but only in the world of half poetry.' How true 10 is that of Pope also ! And he adds : ' Neither Boileau's poetry nor Racine's flows from the fountain-head.' No Englishman, controverting the exaggerated French estimate of these poets, could desire to use fitter words.

I will end with some remarks on Voltaire and Rousseau, remarks in which Joubert eminently shows his prime merit as a critic,—the soundness and completeness of his judgments. I mean that he has the faculty of judging with all the powers of his mind and soul at work together in due combination ; and how rare is this faculty ! how 20 seldom is it exercised towards writers who so powerfully as Voltaire and Rousseau stimulate and call into activity a single side in us !

' Voltaire's wits came to their maturity twenty years sooner than the wits of other men, and remained in full vigour thirty years longer. The charm which our style in general gets from our ideas, his ideas get from his style. Voltaire is sometimes afflicted, sometimes strongly moved ; but serious he never is. His very graces have an effrontery about them. He had correctness of judgment, 30 liveliness of imagination, nimble wits, quick taste, and a moral sense in ruins. He is the most debauched of spirits, and the worst of him is that one gets debauched along with him. If he had been a wise man, and had had the self-discipline of wisdom, beyond a doubt half his wit would have been gone ; it needed an atmosphere of licence in order to play freely. Those people who read him every day, create for themselves, by an invincible law, the necessity of liking him. But those people who, having given up reading him, gaze steadily down upon the influ-40 ences which his spirit has shed abroad, find themselves in simple justice and duty compelled to detest him. It is impossible to be satisfied with him, and impossible not to be fascinated by him.'

The literary sense in us is apt to rebel against so severe a judgment on such a charmer of the literary sense as Voltaire, and perhaps we English are not very liable to catch Voltaire's vices, while of some of his merits we have signal need; still, as the real definitive judgment on Voltaire, Joubert's is undoubtedly the true one. It is nearly identical with that of Goethe. Joubert's sentence on Rousseau is in some respects more favourable:— 10

'That weight in the speaker (auctoritas) which the ancients talk of, is to be found in Bossuet more than in any other French author; Pascal, too, has it, and La Bruyère; even Rousseau has something of it, but Voltaire not a particle. I can understand how a Rousseau—I mean a Rousseau cured of his faults—might at the present day do much good, and may even come to be greatly wanted; but under no circumstances can a Voltaire be of any use.'

The peculiar power of Rousseau's style has never been 20 better hit off than in the following passage:—

'Rousseau imparted, if I may so speak, bowels of feeling to the words he used (donna des entrailles à tous les mots), and poured into them such a charm, sweetness so penetrating, energy so puissant, that his writings have an effect upon the soul something like that of those illicit pleasures which steal away our taste and intoxicate our reason.'

The final judgment, however, is severe, and justly severe:—

'Life without actions; life entirely resolved into 30 affections and half-sensual thoughts; do-nothingness setting up for a virtue; cowardliness with voluptuousness; fierce pride with nullity underneath it; the strutting phrase of the most sensual of vagabonds, who has made his system of philosophy and can give it eloquently forth: there is Rousseau! A piety in which there is no religion; a severity which brings corruption with it; a dogmatism which serves to ruin all authority: there is Rousseau's philosophy! To all tender, ardent, and elevated natures, I say: Only Rousseau can detach you from religion, and 40 only true religion can cure you of Rousseau.'

I must yet find room, before I end, for one at least of Joubert's sayings on political matters ; here, too, the whole man shows himself ; and here, too, the affinity with Coleridge is very remarkable. How true, how true in France especially, is this remark on the contrasting direction taken by the aspirations of the community in ancient and in modern states :—

‘The ancients were attached to their country by three things,—their temples, their tombs, and their forefathers. 10 The two great bonds which united them to their government were the bonds of habit and antiquity. With the moderns, hope and the love of novelty have produced a total change. The ancients said our forefathers, we say posterity ; we do not, like them, love our patria, that is to say, the country and the laws of our fathers, rather we love the laws and the country of our children ; the charm we are most sensible to is the charm of the future, and not the charm of the past.’

And how keen and true is this criticism on the changed 20 sense of the word ‘liberty’ :—

‘A great many words have changed their meaning. The word liberty, for example, had at bottom among the ancients the same meaning as the word dominion. I would be free meant, in the mouth of the ancient, I would take part in governing or administering the State ; in the mouth of a modern it means, I would be independent. The word liberty has with us a moral sense ; with them its sense was purely political.’

Joubert had lived through the French Revolution, and 30 to the modern cry for liberty he was prone to answer :—

‘Let your cry be for free souls rather even than for free men. Moral liberty is the one vitally important liberty, the one liberty which is indispensable ; the other liberty is good and salutary only so far as it favours this. Subordination is in itself a better thing than independence. The one implies order and arrangement ; the other implies only self-sufficiency with isolation. The one means harmony, the other a single tone ; the one is the whole, the other is but the part.’

40 ‘Liberty ! liberty !’ he cries again ; ‘in all things let us have justice, and then we shall have enough liberty.’

Let us have justice, and then we shall have enough liberty. The wise man will never refuse to echo those words ; but then, such is the imperfection of human governments, that almost always, in order to get justice, one has first to secure liberty.

I do not hold up Joubert as a very astonishing and powerful genius, but rather as a delightful and edifying genius. I have not cared to exhibit him as a sayer of brilliant epigrammatic things, such things as, 'Notre vie est du vent tissu . . . les dettes abrègent la vie . . . celui 10 qui a de l'imagination sans érudition a des ailes et n'a pas de pieds' (Our life is woven wind . . . debts take from life . . . the man of imagination without learning has wings and no feet), though for such sayings he is famous. In the first place, the French language is in itself so favourable a vehicle for such sayings, that the making them in it has the less merit ; at least half the merit ought to go, not to the maker of the saying, but to the French language. In the second place, the peculiar beauty of Joubert is not there ; it is not in what is exclusively intellectual,—it is 20 in the union of soul with intellect, and in the delightful, satisfying result which this union produces. 'Vivre, c'est penser et sentir son âme . . . le bonheur est de sentir son âme bonne . . . toute vérité nue et crue n'a pas assez passé par l'âme . . . les hommes ne sont justes qu'envers ceux qu'ils aiment' (The essence of life lies in thinking and being conscious of one's soul . . . happiness is the sense of one's soul being good . . . if a truth is nude and crude, that is a proof it has not been steeped long enough in the soul ; . . . man cannot even be just to his neighbour, unless he loves him) ; 30 it is much rather in sayings like these that Joubert's best and innermost nature manifests itself. He is the most prepossessing and convincing of witnesses to the good of loving light. Because he sincerely loved light, and did not prefer to it any little private darkness of his own, he found light ; his eye was single, and therefore his whole body was full of light. And because he was full of light, he was also full of happiness. In spite of his infirmities, in spite of his sufferings, in spite of his obscurity, he was the happiest man alive ; his life was as charming as his thoughts. For 40 certainly it is natural that the love of light, which is already, in some measure, the possession of light, should irradiate and beatify the whole life of him who has it. There is something unnatural and shocking where, as in the case of Coleridge, it does not. Joubert pains us by no such contradiction; 'the same penetration of spirit which made him such delightful company to his friends, served also to make him perfect in his own personal life, by enabling him always to perceive and do what was right;' he loved and sought light till he became so habituated to it, so accustomed 10 to the joyful testimony of a good conscience, that, to use his own words, 'he could no longer exist without this, and was obliged to live without reproach if he would live without misery.'

Joubert was not famous while he lived, and he will not be famous now that he is dead. But, before we pity him for this, let us be sure what we mean, in literature, by famous. There are the famous men of genius in literature, —the Homers, Dantes, Shakspeares: of them we need not speak; their praise is for ever and ever. Then there are 20 the famous men of ability in literature: their praise is in their own generation. And what makes this difference? The work of the two orders of men is at the bottom the same, —a criticism of life. The end and aim of all literature, if one considers it attentively, is, in truth, nothing but that. But the criticism which the men of genius pass upon human life is permanently acceptable to mankind; the criticism which the men of ability pass upon human life is transitorily acceptable. Between Shakspeare's criticism of human life and Scribe's the difference is there;—the one is per-30 manently acceptable, the other transitorily. Whence then, I repeat, this difference? It is that the acceptableness of Shakspeare's criticism depends upon its inherent truth: the acceptableness of Scribe's upon its suiting itself, by its subject-matter, ideas, mode of treatment, to the taste of the generation that hears it. But the taste and ideas of one generation are not those of the next. This next generation in its turn arrives;—first its sharpshooters, its quick-witted, audacious light troops; then the elephantine main body. The imposing array of its predecessor it conwith many authorities once oracular. Only two kinds of authors are safe in the general havoc. The first kind are the great abounding fountains of truth, whose criticism of life is a source of illumination and joy to the whole human race for ever,—the Homers, the Shakspeares. These are the sacred personages, whom all civilised warfare respects. The second are those whom the out-skirmishers of the new generation, its forerunners,—quick-witted soldiers, as I have said, the select of the army,—recognise, though the bulk of their comrades behind might not, as 10 of the same family and character with the sacred personages, exercising like them an immortal function, and like them inspiring a permanent interest. They snatch them up, and set them in a place of shelter, where the on-coming multitude may not overwhelm them. These are the Jouberts. They will never, like the Shakspeares, command the homage of the multitude; but they are safe; the multitude will not trample them down. Except these two kinds, no author is safe. Let us consider, for example, Joubert's famous contemporary, Lord Jeffrey. All his 20 vivacity and accomplishment avail him nothing; of the true critic he had in an eminent degree no quality, except one,—curiosity. Curiosity he had, but he had no gift for truth; he cannot illuminate and rejoice us; no intelligent out-skirmisher of the new generation cares about him, cares to put him in safety; at this moment we are all passing over his body. Let us consider a greater than Jeffrey, a critic whose reputation still stands firm,—will stand, many people think, for ever,—the great apostle of the Philistines, Lord Macaulay. Lord Macaulay was, 30 as I have already said, a born rhetorician; a splendid rhetorician doubtless, and, beyond that, an English rhetorician also, an honest rhetorician; still, beyond the apparent rhetorical truth of things he never could penetrate; for their vital truth, for what the French call the vraie vérité, he had absolutely no organ; therefore his reputation, brilliant as it is, is not secure. Rhetoric so good as his excites and gives pleasure; but by pleasure alone you cannot permanently bind men's spirits to you. Truth illuminates and gives joy, and it is by the bond of joy, 40 not of pleasure, that men's spirits are indissolubly held.
 40 fidently assails, riddles it with bullets, passes over its body. It goes hard then with many once popular reputations,

As Lord Macaulay's own generation dies out, as a new generation arrives, without those ideas and tendencies of its predecessor which Lord Macaulay so deeply shared and so happily satisfied, will he give the same pleasure ? and, if he ceases to give this, has he enough of light in him to make him safe ? Pleasure the new generation will get from its own novel ideas and tendencies ; but light is another and a rarer thing, and must be treasured wherever it can be found. Will Macaulay be saved, in the sweep and pressure of time, for his light's sake, as Johnson has already been saved by two generations, Joubert by one ? I think it very doubtful. But for a spirit of any delicacy and dignity, what a fate, if he could foresee it ! to be an oracle for one generation, and then of little or no account for ever. How far better, to pass with scant notice through one's own generation, but to be singled out and preserved by the very iconoclasts of the next, then in their turn by those of the next, and so, like the lamp of life itself, to be handed on from one generation to another in safety !

<sup>20</sup> This is Joubert's lot, and it is a very enviable one. The new men of the new generations, while they let the dust deepen on a thousand Laharpes, will say of him : ' He lived in the Philistine's day, in a place and time when almost every idea current in literature had the mark of Dagon upon it, and not the mark of the children of light. Nay, the children of light were as yet hardly so much as heard of : the Canaanite was then in the land. Still, there were even then a few, who, nourished on some secret tradition, or illumined, perhaps, by a divine inspiration, kept aloof from the reigning superstitions, never bowed the knee to the gods

<sup>30</sup> of Canaan ; and one of these few was called Joubert.'

SPINOZA AND THE BIBLE.

'By the sentence of the angels, by the decree of the saints, we anathematise, cut off, curse, and execrate Baruch Spinoza, in the presence of these sacred books with the six hundred and thirteen precepts which are written therein, with the anathema wherewith Joshua anathematised Jericho ; with the cursing wherewith Elisha cursed the children ; and with all the cursings which are written in the Book of the Law : cursed be he by day, and cursed by night ; cursed when he lieth down, and cursed when he riseth up ; cursed when he goeth out, and 10 cursed when he cometh in ; the Lord pardon him never ; the wrath and fury of the Lord burn upon this man, and bring upon him all the curses which are written in the Book of the Law. The Lord blot out his name under heaven. The Lord set him apart for destruction from all the tribes of Israel, with all the curses of the firmament which are written in the Book of this Law. . . . There shall no man speak to him, no man write to him, no man show him any kindness, no man stay under the same roof with him, no man come nigh him.' 20

With these amenities, the current compliments of theological parting, the Jews of the Portuguese synagogue at Amsterdam took in 1656 (and not in 1660 as has till now been commonly supposed) their leave of their erring brother, Baruch or Benedict Spinoza. They remained children of Israel, and he became a child of modern Europe.

That was in 1656, and Spinoza died in 1677, at the early age of forty-four. Glory had not found him out. His short life—a life of unbroken diligence, kindness, and 30 purity—was passed in seclusion. But in spite of that seclusion, in spite of the shortness of his career, in spite of the hostility of the dispensers of renown in the eighteenth century,—of Voltaire's disparagement and Bayle's detrac-tion,—in spite of the repellent form which he has given to his principal work, in spite of the exterior semblance of a rigid dogmatism alien to the most essential tendencies of modern philosophy, in spite, finally, of the immense weight of disfavour cast upon him by the long-repeated charge of atheism, Spinoza's name has silently risen in importance, the man and his work have attracted a steadily increasing notice, and bid fair to become soon what they deserve to become,—in the history of modern philosophy, 10 the central point of interest. An avowed translation of one of his works,—his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus,—has at last made its appearance in English. It is the principal work which Spinoza published in his lifetime; his book on ethics, the work on which his fame rests, is posthumous.

The English translator has not done his task well. Of the character of his version there can, I am afraid, be no doubt; one such passage as the following is decisive:—

'I confess that, while with them (the theologians) I have never been able sufficiently to admire the unfathomed
 20 mysteries of Scripture, I have still found them giving utterance to nothing but Aristotelian and Platonic speculations, artfully dressed up and cunningly accommodated to Holy Writ, lest the speakers should show themselves too plainly to belong to the sect of the Grecian heathens. Nor was it enough for these men to discourse with the Greeks; they have further taken to raving with the Hebrew prophets.'

This professes to be a translation of these words of Spinoza: 'Fateor, eos nunquam satis mirari potuisse Scripturae profundissima mysteria; attamen praeter 30 Aristotelicorum vel Platonicorum speculationes nihil docuisse video, atque his, ne gentiles sectari viderentur, Scripturam accommodaverunt. Non satis his fuit cum Graecis insanire, sed prophetas cum iisdem deliravisse voluerunt.' After one such specimen of a translator's force, the experienced reader has a sort of instinct that he may as well close the book at once, with a smile or a sigh, according as he happens to be a follower of the weeping or of the laughing philosopher. If, in spite of this instinct, he persists in going on with the English version of the 40 Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, he will find many more such specimens. It is not, however, my intention to fill my space with these, or with strictures upon their author. I prefer to remark, that he renders a service to literary history by pointing out, in his preface, how 'to Bayle may be traced the disfavour in which the name of Spinoza was so long held;' that, in his observations on the system of the Church of England, he shows a laudable freedom from the prejudices of ordinary English Liberals of that advanced school to which he clearly belongs; and lastly, that, though he manifests little familiarity with Latin, he seems to have considerable familiarity with 10 philosophy, and to be well able to follow and comprehend speculative reasoning. Let me advise him to unite his forces with those of some one who has that accurate knowledge of Latin which he himself has not, and then, perhaps, of that union a really good translation of Spinoza will be the result. And, having given him this advice, let me again turn, for a little, to the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus itself.

ARNOLD

O

This work, as I have already said, is a work on the interpretation of Scripture,—it treats of the Bible. What 20 was it exactly which Spinoza thought about the Bible and its inspiration? That will be, at the present moment, the central point of interest for the English readers of his Treatise. Now, it is to be observed, that just on this very point the Treatise, interesting and remarkable as it is, will fail to satisfy the reader. It is important to seize this notion quite firmly, and not to quit hold of it while one is reading Spinoza's work. The scope of that work is this. Spinoza sees that the life and practice of Christian nations professing the religion of the Bible, are not the 30 due fruits of the religion of the Bible; he sees only hatred, bitterness, and strife, where he might have expected to see love, joy, and peace in believing; and he asks himself the reason of this. The reason is, he says, that these people misunderstand their Bible. Well, then, in his conclusion, I will write a Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. I will show these people, that, taking the Bible for granted, taking it to be all which it asserts itself to be, taking it to have all the authority which it claims, it is not what they imagine it to be, it does not say what they imagine it to say. I will 40 show them what it really does say, and I will show them that they will do well to accept this real teaching of the Bible, instead of the phantom with which they have so long been cheated. I will show their governments that they will do well to remodel the national churches, to make of them institutions informed with the spirit of the true Bible, instead of institutions informed with the spirit of this false phantom.

The comments of men, Spinoza said, had been foisted into the Christian religion; the pure teaching of God
 10 had been lost sight of. He determined, therefore, to go again to the Bible, to read it over and over with a perfectly unprejudiced mind, and to accept nothing as its teaching which it did not clearly teach. He began by constructing a method, or set of conditions indispensable for the adequate interpretation of Scripture. These conditions are such, he points out, that a perfectly adequate interpretation of Scripture is now impossible. For example, to understand any prophet thoroughly, we ought to know 20 the life, character, and pursuits of that prophet, under what circumstances his book was composed, and in what state and through what hands it has come down to us; and, in general, most of this we cannot now know. Still, the main sense of the Books of Scripture may be clearly seized by us. Himself a Jew with all the learning of his nation, and a man of the highest natural powers, Spinoza had in the difficult task of seizing this sense every aid which special knowledge or pre-eminent faculties could supply.

In what then, he asks, does Scripture, interpreted by 30 its own aid, and not by the aid of Rabbinical traditions or Greek philosophy, allege its own divinity to consist? In a revelation given by God to the prophets. Now all knowledge is a divine revelation; but prophecy, as represented in Scripture, is one of which the laws of human nature, considered in themselves alone, cannot be the cause. Therefore nothing must be asserted about it, except what is clearly declared by the prophets themselves; for they are our only source of knowledge on a matter 40 which does not fall within the scope of our ordinary knowing faculties. But ignorant people, not knowing the Hebrew genius and phraseology, and not attending to the circumstances of the speaker, often imagine the prophets to assert things which they do not.

The prophets clearly declare themselves to have received the revelation of God through the means of words and images ;—not, as Christ, through immediate communication of the mind with the mind of God. Therefore the prophets excelled other men by the power and vividness of their representing and imagining faculty, not by the perfection of their mind. This is why they perceived almost everything through figures, and express themselves so variously, 10 and so improperly, concerning the nature of God. Moses imagined that God could be seen, and attributed to him the passions of anger and jealousy ; Micaiah imagined him sitting on a throne, with the host of heaven on his right and left hand ; Daniel as an old man, with a white garment and white hair ; Ezekiel as a fire ; the disciples of Christ thought they saw the Spirit of God in the form of a dove ; the apostles in the form of fiery tongues.

Whence, then, could the prophets be certain of the truth of a revelation which they received through the 20 imagination, and not by a mental process ?—for only an idea can carry the sense of its own certainty along with it, not an imagination. To make them certain of the truth of what was revealed to them, a reasoning process came in ; they had to rely on the testimony of a sign ; and (above all) on the testimony of their own conscience, that they were good men, and spoke for God's sake. Either testimony was incomplete without the other. Even the good prophet needed for his message the confirmation of a sign ; but the bad prophet, the utterer of an immoral doctrine, had no 30 certainty for his doctrine, no truth in it, even though he confirmed it by a sign. The testimony of a good conscience was, therefore, the prophet's grand source of certitude. Even this, however, was only a moral certitude, not a mathematical ; for no man can be perfectly sure of his own goodness.

The power of imagining, the power of feeling what goodness is, and the habit of practising goodness, were therefore the sole essential qualifications of a true prophet. But for the purpose of the message, the revelation, which God 40 designed him to convey, these qualifications were enough.

The sum and substance of this revelation was simply: Believe in God, and lead a good life. To be the organ of this revelation, did not make a man more learned; it left his scientific knowledge as it found it. This explains the contradictory and speculatively false opinions about God, and the laws of nature, which the patriarchs, the prophets, the apostles entertained. Abraham and the patriarchs knew God only as El Sadai, the power which gives to every man that which suffices him; Moses knew him as Jehovah,
 10 a self-existent being, but imagined him with the passions of a man. Samuel imagined that God could not repent of his sentences; Jeremiah, that he could. Joshua, on a day of great victory, the ground being white with hail, seeing the daylight last longer than usual, and imaginatively seizing this as a special sign of the help divinely promised to him, declared that the sun was standing still. To be obeyers of God themselves, and inspired leaders of others to obedience and good life, did not make Abraham and Moses metaphysicians, or Joshua a natural philosopher.
 20 His revelation no more changed the speculative opinions of each prophet, than it changed his temperament or style. The wrathful Elisha required the natural sedative of music, before he could be the messenger of good fortune to Jehoram. The high-bred Isaiah and Nahum have the style proper to their condition, and the rustic Ezekiel and Amos the style proper to theirs. We are not therefore bound to pay heed to the speculative opinions of this or that prophet, for in uttering these he spoke as a mere man: only in exhorting his hearers to obey God and lead a good life was 30 he the organ of a divine revelation.

To know and love God is the highest blessedness of man, and of all men alike; to this all mankind are called, and not any one nation in particular. The divine law, properly so named, is the method of life for attaining this height of human blessedness: this law is universal, written in the heart, and one for all mankind. Human law is the method of life for attaining and preserving temporal security and prosperity: this law is dictated by a lawgiver, and every nation has its own. In the case
 40 of the Jews, this law was dictated, by revelation, through the prophets; its fundamental precept was to obey God and to keep his commandments, and it is therefore, in a secondary sense, called divine ; but it was, nevertheless, framed in respect of temporal things only. Even the truly moral and divine precept of this law, to practise for God's sake justice and mercy towards one's neighbour, meant for the Hebrew of the Old Testament his Hebrew neighbour only, and had respect to the concord and stability of the Hebrew commonwealth. The Jews were to obey God and to keep his commandments, that they might continue long in the land given to them, and that it might be well 10 with them there. Their election was a temporal one, and lasted only so long as their State. It is now over ; and the only election the Jews now have is that of the pious, the remnant, which takes place, and has always taken place, in every other nation also. Scripture itself teaches that there is a universal divine law, that this is common to all nations alike, and is the law which truly confers eternal blessedness. Solomon, the wisest of the Jews, knew this law, as the few wisest men in all nations have ever known it ; but for the mass of the Jews, as for the mass of man- 20 kind everywhere, this law was hidden, and they had no notion of its moral action, its vera vita which conducts to eternal blessedness, except so far as this action was enjoined upon them by the prescriptions of their temporal law. When the ruin of their State brought with it the ruin of their temporal law, they would have lost altogether their only clue to eternal blessedness.

Christ came when that fabric of the Jewish State, for the sake of which the Jewish law existed, was about to fall ; and he proclaimed the universal divine law. A certain 30 moral action is prescribed by this law, as a certain moral action was prescribed by the Jewish law : but he who truly conceives the universal divine law conceives God's decrees adequately as eternal truths, and for him moral action has liberty and self-knowledge ; while the prophets of the Jewish law inadequately conceived God's decrees as mere rules and commands, and for them moral action had no liberty and no self-knowledge. Christ who beheld the decrees of God as God himself beholds them,—as eternal truths,—proclaimed the love of God and the love 40 of our neighbour as commands, only because of the ignorance of the multitude : to those to whom it was ' given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God,' he announced them, as he himself perceived them, as eternal truths. And the apostles, like Christ, spoke to many of their hearers ' as unto carnal not spiritual ;' presented to them, that is, the love of God and their neighbour as a divine command authenticated by the life and death of Christ, not as an eternal idea of reason carrying its own warrant along with it. The presentation of it as this latter their hearers

10 ' were not able to bear.' The apostles, moreover, though they preached and confirmed their doctrine by signs as prophets, wrote their Epistles, not as prophets, but as doctors and reasoners. The essentials of their doctrine, indeed, they took not from reason, but, like the prophets, from fact and revelation ; they preached belief in God and goodness of life as a catholic religion existing by virtue of the passion of Christ, as the prophets had preached belief in God and goodness of life as a national religion existing by virtue of the Mosaic covenant : but while

20 the prophets announced their message in a form purely dogmatical, the apostles developed theirs with the forms of reasoning and argumentation, according to each apostle's ability and way of thinking, and as they might best commend their message to their hearers ; and for their reasonings they themselves claim no divine authority, submitting them to the judgment of their hearers. Thus each apostle built essential religion on a non-essential foundation of his own, and, as St. Paul says, avoided building on the foundations of another apostle, which might be quite different from his 30 own. Hence the discrepancies between the doctrine of one apostle and another,—between that of St. Paul, for example, and that of St. James ; but these discrepancies are in the non-essentials not given to them by revelation, and not in essentials. Human churches, seizing these discrepant non-essentials as essentials, one maintaining one of them, another another, have filled the world with unprofitable disputes, have ' turned the Church into an academy, and religion into a science, or rather a wrangling,' and have fallen into endless schism.

40 What, then, are the essentials of religion according both to the Old and to the New Testament ? Very few and very simple. The precept to love God and our neighbour. The precepts of the first chapter of Isaiah : ' Wash you, make you clean ; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes ; cease to do evil ; learn to do well ; seek judgment ; relieve the oppressed ; judge the fatherless ; plead for the widow.' The precepts of the Sermon on the Mount, which add to the foregoing the injunction that we should cease to do evil and learn to do well, not to our brethren and fellow-citizens only, but to all mankind. It is by following these precepts that belief <sup>10</sup> in God is to be shown : if we believe in him, we shall keep his commandment ; and this is his commandment, that we love one another. It is because it contains these precepts that the Bible is properly called the Word of God, in spite of its containing much that is mere history, and, like all history, sometimes true, sometimes false ; in spite of its containing much that is mere reasoning, and, like all reasoning, sometimes sound, sometimes hollow. These precepts are also the precepts of the universal divine law written in our hearts ; and it is only by this that the <sup>20</sup> divinity of Scripture is established ;—by its containing, namely, precepts identical with those of this inly-written and self-proving law. This law was in the world, as St. John says, before the doctrine of Moses or the doctrine of Christ. And what need was there, then, for these doctrines ? Because the world at large ' knew not ' this original divine law, in which precepts are ideas, and the belief in God the knowledge and contemplation of him. Reason gives us this law, reason tells us that it leads to eternal blessedness, and that those who follow it have no need of any other. <sup>30</sup> But reason could not have told us that the moral action of the universal divine law,—followed not from a sense of its intrinsic goodness, truth, and necessity, but simply in proof of obedience (for both the Old and New Testament are but one long discipline of obedience), simply because it is so commanded by Moses in virtue of the covenant, simply because it is so commanded by Christ in virtue of his life and passion,—can lead to eternal blessedness, which means, for reason, eternal knowledge. Reason could not have told us this, and this is what the Bible tells us. This <sup>40</sup> is that ' thing which had been kept secret since the foundation of the world.' It is thus that by means of the foolishness of the world God confounds the wise, and with things that are not brings to nought things that are. Of the truth of the promise thus made to obedience without knowledge, we can have no mathematical certainty; for we can have a mathematical certainty only of things deduced by reason from elements which she in herself possesses. But we can have a moral certainty of it; a certainty such as the prophets had themselves, arising out of the goodness 10 and pureness of those to whom this revelation has been made, and rendered possible for us by its contradicting no principles of reason. It is a great comfort to believe it; because 'as it is only the very small minority who can pursue a virtuous life by the sole guidance of reason, we should, unless we had this testimony of Scripture, be in doubt respecting the salvation of nearly the whole human race.'

It follows from this that philosophy has her own independent sphere, and theology hers, and that neither 20 has the right to invade and try to subdue the other. Theology demands perfect obedience, philosophy perfect knowledge: the obedience demanded by theology and the knowledge demanded by philosophy are alike saving. As speculative opinions about God, theology requires only such as are indispensable to the reality of this obedience; the belief that God is, that he is a rewarder of them that seek him, and that the proof of seeking him is a good life. These are the fundamentals of faith, and they are so clear and simple that none of the inaccuracies provable in the 30 Bible narrative the least affect them, and they have indubitably come to us uncorrupted. He who holds them may make, as the patriarchs and prophets did, other speculations about God most erroneous, and yet their faith is complete and saving. Nay, beyond these fundamentals, speculative opinions are pious or impious, not as they are true or false, but as they confirm or shake the believer in the practice of obedience. The truest speculative opinion about the nature of God is impious if it makes its holder rebellious; the falsest speculative opinion is pious 40 if it makes him obedient. Governments should never render themselves the tools of ecclesiastical ambition by promulgating as fundamentals of the national Church's faith more than these, and should concede the fullest liberty of speculation.

But the multitude, which respects only what astonishes, terrifies, and overwhelms it, by no means takes this simple view of its own religion. To the multitude, religion seems imposing only when it is subversive of reason, confirmed by miracles, conveyed in documents materially sacred and infallible, and dooming to damnation all without its pale. But this religion of the multitude is not the religion 10 which a true interpretation of Scripture finds in Scripture. Reason tells us that a miracle,—understanding by a miracle a breach of the laws of nature,—is impossible, and that to think it possible is to dishonour God ; for the laws of nature are the laws of God, and to say that God violates the laws of nature is to say that he violates his own nature. Reason sees, too, that miracles can never attain their professed object,—that of bringing us to a higher knowledge of God ; since our knowledge of God is raised only by perfect- 20 ing and clearing our conceptions, and the alleged design of miracles is to baffle them. But neither does Scripture anywhere assert, as a general truth, that miracles are possible. Indeed, it asserts the contrary ; for Jeremiah declares that Nature follows an invariable order. Scripture, however, like Nature herself, does not lay down speculative propositions (Scriptura definitiones non tradit, ut nec etiam natura). It relates matters in such an order and with such phraseology as a speaker (often not perfectly instructed himself) who wanted to impress his hearers with a lively sense of God's greatness and goodness would 30 naturally employ ; as Moses, for instance, relates to the Israelites the passage of the Red Sea without any mention of the east wind which attended it, and which is brought accidentally to our knowledge in another place. So that to know exactly what Scripture means in the relation of each seeming miracle, we ought to know (besides the tropes and phrases of the Hebrew language) the circumstances, and also,—since every one is swayed in his manner of presenting facts by his own preconceived opinions, and we have seen what those of the prophets were,—the preconceived 40 opinions of each speaker. But this mode of interpreting Scripture is fatal to the vulgar notion of its verbal inspiration, of a sanctity and absolute truth in all the words and sentences of which it is composed. This vulgar notion is, indeed, a palpable error. It is demonstrable from the internal testimony of the Scriptures themselves, that the books from the first of the Pentateuch to the last of Kings were put together, after the first destruction of Jerusalem, by a compiler (probably Ezra) who designed to relate the history of the Jewish people from its origin to that destruction; it is demonstrable, moreover, that the compiler did not put his last hand to the work, but left it with its extracts from various and conflicting sources sometimes unreconciled, left it with errors of text and unsettled readings. The prophetic books are mere fragments of the prophets, collected by the Rabbins where they could find them, and inserted in the Canon according to their discretion. They, at first, proposed to admit neither the Book of Proverbs nor the Book of Ecclesiastes into the Canon, and only admitted them because there were found in them passages which commended the law of Moses. Ezekiel also they had determined to exclude; but one of their number remodelled him, so as to procure his admission. The Books of Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and Daniel are the work of a single author, and were not written till after Judas Maccabeus had restored the worship of the Temple. The Book of Psalms was collected and arranged at the same time. Before this time, there was no Canon of the sacred writings, and the great synagogue, by which the Canon was fixed, was first convened after the Macedonian conquest of Asia. Of that synagogue none of the prophets were members; the learned men who composed it were guided by their own fallible judgment. In like manner the uninspired judgment of human councils determined the Canon of the New Testament.

Such, reduced to the briefest and plainest terms possible, stripped of the developments and proofs with which he delivers it, and divested of the metaphysical language in which much of it is clothed by him, is the doctrine of Spinoza's treatise on the interpretation of Scripture. By the whole scope and drift of its argument, by the spirit in which the subject is throughout treated, his work undeniably is most interesting and stimulating to the general culture of Europe. There are alleged contradictions in Scripture; and the question which the general culture of Europe, informed of this, asks with real interest is: What then? Spinoza addresses himself to this question. All secondary points of criticism he touches with the utmost possible brevity. He points out that Moses could never have written: 'And the Canaanite was then in the land,' because the Canaanite was in the land still at the death of 10 Moses. He points out that Moses could never have written: 'There arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses.' He points out how such a passage as, 'These are the kings that reigned in Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel,' clearly indicates an author writing not before the times of the Kings. He points out how the account of Og's iron bedstead: 'Only Og the king of Bashan remained of the remnant of giants; behold, his bedstead was a bedstead of iron; is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon?'—probably indicates an author 20 writing after David had taken Rabbath, and found there 'abundance of spoil,' amongst it this iron bedstead, the gigantic relic of another age. He points out how the language of this passage, and of such a passage as that in the Book of Samuel: 'Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to inquire of God, thus he spake: Come and let us go to the seer; for he that is now called prophet was aforetime called seer'—is certainly the language of a writer describing the events of a long-past age, and not the language of a contemporary. But he devotes to all this no more space than 30 is absolutely necessary. He apologises for delaying over such matters so long: non est cur circa haec diu detinear—nolo taediosâ lectione lectorem detinere. For him the interesting question is, not whether the fanatical devotee of the letter is to continue, for a longer or for a shorter time, to believe that Moses sate in the land of Moab writing the description of his own death, but what he is to believe when he does not believe this. Is he to take for the guidance of his life a great gloss put upon the Bible by theologians, who, 'not content with going mad themselves with Plato 40 and Aristotle, want to make Christ and the prophets go mad with them too,'—or the Bible itself? Is he to be presented by his national church with metaphysical formularies for his creed, or with the real fundamentals of Christianity? If with the former, religion will never produce its due fruits. A few elect will still be saved; but the vast majority of mankind will remain without grace and without good works, hateful and hating one another. Therefore he calls urgently upon governments to make the national church what it should be. This 10 is the conclusion of the whole matter for him; a fervent appeal to the State, to save us from the untoward generation of metaphysical Article-makers. And therefore, anticipating Mr. Gladstone, he called his book 'The Church in its Relations with the State.'

Such is really the scope of Spinoza's work. He pursues a great object, and pursues it with signal ability; but it is important to observe that he does not give us his own opinion about the Bible's fundamental character. He takes the Bible as it stands, as he might take the phenomena 20 of nature, and he discusses it as he finds it. Revelation differs from natural knowledge, he says, not by being more divine or more certain than natural knowledge, but by being conveyed in a different way; it differs from it because it is a knowledge 'of which the laws of human nature considered in themselves alone cannot be the cause.' What is really its cause, he says, we need not here inquire (verum nec nobis jam opus est propheticae cognitionis causam scire), for we take Scripture, which contains this revelation, as it stands, and do not ask how 30 it arose (documentorum causas nihil curamus).

Proceeding on this principle, Spinoza leaves the attentive reader somewhat baffled and disappointed, clear as is his way of treating his subject, and remarkable as are the conclusions with which he presents us. He starts, we feel, from what is to him a hypothesis, and we want to know what he really thinks about this hypothesis. His greatest novelties are all within limits fixed for him by this hypothesis. He says that the voice which called Samuel was an body; he says that the rainbow which was made a sign to Noah appeared in the ordinary course of nature. Scripture itself, rightly interpreted, says, he affirms, all this. But he asserts that the voice which uttered the commandments on Mount Sinai was a real voice, a vera vox. He says, indeed, that this voice could not really give to the Israelites that proof which they imagined it gave to them of the existence of God, and that God on Sinai was dealing with the Israelites only according to their imperfect knowledge. Still he asserts the voice to have been a real one; and for 10 this reason, that we do violence to Scripture if we do not admit it to have been a real one (nisi Scripturae vim inferre velimus, omnino concedendum est, Israëlitæ veram vocem audivisse). The attentive reader wants to know what Spinoza himself thought about this vera vox and its possibility; he is much more interested in knowing this, than in knowing what Spinoza considered Scripture to affirm about the matter.
 40 imaginary voice; he says that the waters of the Red Sea retreated before a strong wind; he says that the Shunamite's son was revived by the natural heat of Elisha's

The feeling of perplexity thus caused is not diminished by the language of the chapter on miracles. In this chapter 20 Spinoza broadly affirms a miracle to be an impossibility. But he himself contrasts the method of demonstration à priori, by which he claims to have established this proposition, with the method which he has pursued in treating of prophetic revelation. 'This revelation,' he says, 'is a matter out of human reach, and therefore I was bound to take it as I found it.' Monere volo, me aliâ prorsus methodo circa miracula processisse, quam circa prophetiam . . . quod etiam consulto feci, quia de prophetiâ, quandoquidem ipsa captum humanum superat et quaestio 30 mere theologica est, nihil affirmare, neque etiam scire poteram in quo ipsa potissimum constiterit, nisi ex fundamentis revelatis. The reader feels that Spinoza, proceeding on a hypothesis, has presented him with the assertion of a miracle, and afterwards, proceeding à priori, has presented him with the assertion that a miracle is impossible. He feels that Spinoza does not adequately reconcile these two assertions by declaring that any event really miraculous, if found recorded in Scripture, must be 'a spurious addition made to Scripture by sacrilegious men.' Is, then, he asks, 40 the vera vox of Mount Sinai in Spinoza's opinion a spurious addition made to Scripture by sacrilegious men ; or, if not, how is it not miraculous ?

Spinoza, in his own mind, regarded the Bible as a vast collection of miscellaneous documents, many of them quite disparate and not at all to be harmonised with others ; documents of unequal value and of varying applicability, some of them conveying ideas salutary for one time, others for another. But in the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus he by no means always deals in this free spirit with the 10 Bible. Sometimes he chooses to deal with it in the spirit of the veriest worshipper of the letter ; sometimes he chooses to treat the Bible as if all its parts were (so to speak) equipollent ; to snatch an isolated text which suits his purpose, without caring whether it is annulled by the context, by the general drift of Scripture, or by other passages of more weight and authority. The great critic thus becomes voluntarily as uncritical as Exeter Hall. The epicurean Solomon, whose Ecclesiastes the Hebrew doctors, even after they had received it into the canon, forbade the young and 20 weak-minded among their community to read, Spinoza quotes as of the same authority with the severe Moses ; he uses promiscuously, as documents of identical force, without discriminating between their essentially different character, the softened cosmopolitan teaching of the prophets of the captivity and the rigid national teaching of the instructors of Israel's youth. He is capable of extracting, from a chance expression of Jeremiah, the assertion of a speculative idea which Jeremiah certainly never entertained, and from which he would have recoiled in dismay,—the 30 idea, namely, that miracles are impossible ; just as the ordinary Englishman can extract from God's words to Noah, Be fruitful and multiply, an exhortation to himself to have a large family. Spinoza, I repeat, knew perfectly well what this verbal mode of dealing with the Bible was worth : but he sometimes uses it because of the hypothesis from which he set out ; because of his having agreed ' to take Scripture as it stands, and not to ask how it arose.'

No doubt the sagacity of Spinoza's rules for Biblical interpretation, the power of his analysis of the contents of worth of their own, independent of the silence or ambiguity of their author upon a point of cardinal importance. Few candid people will read his rules of interpretation without exclaiming that they are the very dictates of good sense, that they have always believed in them; and without adding, after a moment's reflection, that they have passed their lives in violating them. And what can be more interesting than to find that perhaps the main cause of the decay of the Jewish polity was one of which from our English Bible, which entirely mistranslates the 26th 10 verse of the 20th chapter of Ezekiel, we hear nothing,—the perpetual reproach of impurity and rejection cast upon the mass of the Hebrew nation by the exclusive priesthood of the tribe of Levi? What can be more suggestive, after Mr. Mill and Dr. Stanley have been telling us how great an element of strength to the Hebrew nation was the institution of prophets, than to hear from the ablest of Hebrews how this institution seems to him to have been to his nation one of her main elements of weakness? No intelligent man can read the Tractatus 20 Theologico-Politicus without being profoundly instructed by it: but neither can he read it without feeling that, as a speculative work, it is, to use a French military expression, in the air; that, in a certain sense, it is in want of a base and in want of supports; that this base and these supports are, at any rate, not to be found in the work itself, and, if they exist, must be sought for in other works of the author.
 40 the Bible, the interest of his reflections on Jewish history, are, in spite of this, very great, and have an absolute

The genuine speculative opinions of Spinoza, which the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus but imperfectly reveals, 30 may in his Ethics and in his Letters be found set forth clearly. It is, however, the business of criticism to deal with every independent work as with an independent whole, and, instead of establishing between the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus and the Ethics of Spinoza a relation which Spinoza himself has not established,—to seize, in dealing with the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, the important fact that this work has its source, not in the axioms and definitions of the Ethics, but in a hypothesis. The Ethics are not yet translated into English, and I have not 40 here to speak of them. Then will be the right time for criticism to try and seize the special character and tendencies of that remarkable work, when it is dealing with it directly. The criticism of the Ethics is far too serious a task to be undertaken incidentally, and merely as a supplement to the criticism of the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. Nevertheless, on certain governing ideas of Spinoza, which receive their systematic expression, indeed, in the Ethics, and on which the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus is not formally based, but which are yet never absent from Spinoza's 10 mind in the composition of any work, which breathe through all his works, and fill them with a peculiar effect and power, I have a word or two to say.

A philosopher's real power over mankind resides not in his metaphysical formulas, but in the spirit and tendencies which have led him to adopt those formulas. Spinoza's critic, therefore, has rather to bring to light that spirit and those tendencies of his author, than to exhibit his metaphysical formulas. Propositions about substance pass by mankind at large like the idle wind, 20 which mankind at large regards not; it will not even listen to a word about these propositions, unless it first learns what their author was driving at with them, and finds that this object of his is one with which it sympathises, one, at any rate, which commands its attention. And mankind is so far right that this object of the author is really, as has been said, that which is most important, that which sets all his work in motion, that which is the secret of his attraction for other minds, which, by different ways, pursue the same object.

30 Mr. Maurice, seeking for the cause of Goethe's great admiration for Spinoza, thinks that he finds it in Spinoza's Hebrew genius. 'He spoke of God,' says Mr. Maurice, 'as an actual being, to those who had fancied him a name in a book. The child of the circumcision had a message for Lessing and Goethe which the pagan schools of philosophy could not bring.' This seems to me, I confess, fanciful. An intensity and impressiveness, which came to him from his Hebrew nature, Spinoza no doubt has; but the two things which are most remarkable about him, and 40 by which, as I think, he chiefly impressed Goethe, seem to me not to come to him from his Hebrew nature at all,

ARNOLD

P

—I mean his denial of final causes, and his stoicism, a stoicism not passive, but active. For a mind like Goethe's, —a mind profoundly impartial and passionately aspiring after the science, not of men only, but of universal nature,—the popular philosophy which explains all things by reference to man, and regards universal nature as existing for the sake of man, and even of certain classes of men, was utterly repulsive. Unchecked, this philosophy would gladly maintain that the donkey exists in order that the invalid Christian may have donkey's milk before break- 10 fast; and such views of nature as this were exactly what Goethe's whole soul abhorred. Creation, he thought, should be made of sterner stuff; he desired to rest the donkey's existence on larger grounds. More than any philosopher who has ever lived, Spinoza satisfied him here. The full exposition of the counter-doctrine to the popular doctrine of final causes is to be found in the Ethics; but this denial of final causes was so essential an element of all Spinoza's thinking that we shall, as has been said already, find it in the work with which we are here con- 20 cerned, the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, and, indeed, permeating that work and all his works. From the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus one may take as good a general statement of this denial as any which is to be found in the Ethics:—

'Deus naturam dirigit, prout ejus leges universales, non autem prout humanae naturae particulares leges exigunt, adeoque Deus non solius humani generis, sed totius naturae rationem habet.' (God directs nature, according as the universal laws of nature, but not according as the particular 30 laws of human nature require; and so God has regard, not of the human race only, but of entire nature.)

And, as a pendant to this denial by Spinoza of final causes, comes his stoicism:—

'Non studemus, ut natura nobis, sed contra ut nos naturae pareamus.' (Our desire is not that nature may obey us, but, on the contrary, that we may obey nature.)

Here is the second source of his attractiveness for Goethe; and Goethe is but the eminent representative of a whole order of minds whose admiration has made 40 Spinoza's fame. Spinoza first impresses Goethe and any man like Goethe, and then he composes him ; first he fills and satisfies his imagination by the width and grandeur of his view of nature, and then he fortifies and stills his mobile, straining, passionate, poetic temperament by the moral lesson he draws from his view of nature. And a moral lesson not of mere resigned acquiescence, not of melancholy quietism, but of joyful activity within the limits of man's true sphere :—

'Ipsa hominis essentia est conatus quo unusquisque
 10 suum esse conservare conatur. . . . Virtus hominis est ipsa hominis essentia, quatenus a solo conatu suum esse conservandi definitur. . . . Felicitas in eo consistit quod homo suum esse conservare potest. . . . Laetitia est hominis transitio ad majorem perfectionem. . . . Tristitia est hominis transitio ad minorem perfectionem.' (*Man's very essence is the effort wherewith each man strives to maintain his own being. . . . Man's virtue is this very essence, so far as it is defined by this single effort to maintain his own being. . . .
 Happiness consists in a man's being able to maintain his 20 own being. . . . Joy is man's passage to a greater perfection.
 . . . Sorrow is man's passage to a lesser perfection.*)

It seems to me that by neither of these, his grand characteristic doctrines, is Spinoza truly Hebrew or truly Christian. His denial of final causes is essentially alien to the spirit of the Old Testament, and his cheerful and self-sufficing stoicism is essentially alien to the spirit of the New. The doctrine that 'God directs nature, not according as the particular laws of human nature, but according as the universal laws of nature require,' is at utter variance with 30 that Hebrew mode of representing God's dealings, which makes the locusts visit Egypt to punish Pharaoh's hardness of heart, and the falling dew avert itself from the fleece of Gideon. The doctrine that 'all sorrow is a passage to a lesser perfection' is at utter variance with the Christian recognition of the blessedness of sorrow, working 'repentance to salvation not to be repented of ;' of sorrow, which, in Dante's words, 'remarries us to God.'

Spinoza's repeated and earnest assertions that the love of God is man's summum bonum do not remove the funda-40 mental diversity between his doctrine and the Hebrew and Christian doctrines. By the love of God he does not mean the same thing which the Hebrew and Christian religions mean by the love of God. He makes the love of God to consist in the knowledge of God ; and, as we know God only through his manifestation of himself in the laws of all nature, it is by knowing these laws that we love God, and the more we know them the more we love him. This may be true, but this is not what the Christian means by the love of God. Spinoza's ideal is the intellectual life ; the Christian's ideal is the religious life. Between the two conditions there is all the difference which there is between 10 the being in love, and the following, with delighted comprehension, a reasoning of Plato. For Spinoza, undoubtedly, the crown of the intellectual life is a transport, as for the saint the crown of the religious life is a transport ; but the two transports are not the same.

This is true ; yet it is true, also, that by thus crowning the intellectual life with a sacred transport, by thus retaining in philosophy, amid the discontented murmurs of all the army of atheism, the name of God, Spinoza maintains a profound affinity with that which is truest in religion, 20 and inspires an indestructible interest. One of his admirers, M. Van Vloten, has recently published at Amsterdam a supplementary volume to Spinoza's works, containing the interesting document of Spinoza's sentence of excommunication, from which I have already quoted, and containing, besides, several lately found works alleged to be Spinoza's, which seem to me to be of doubtful authenticity, and, even if authentic, of no great importance. M. Van Vloten (who, let me be permitted to say in passing, writes a Latin which would make one think that the art of writing 30 Latin must be now a lost art in the country of Lipsius) is very anxious that Spinoza's unscientific retention of the name of God should not afflict his readers with any doubts as to his perfect scientific orthodoxy :—

'It is a great mistake,' he cries, 'to disparage Spinoza as merely one of the dogmatists before Kant. By keeping the name of God, while he did away with his person and character, he has done himself an injustice. Those who look to the bottom of things will see, that, long ago as he lived, he had*even then reached the point to which the 40 post-Hegelian philosophy and the study of natural science has only just brought our own times. Leibnitz expressed his apprehension lest those who did away with final causes should do away with God at the same time. But it is in his having done away with final causes, and with God along with them, that Spinoza's true merit consists.'

Now it must be remarked that to use Spinoza's denial of final causes in order to identify him with the Coryphaei of atheism, is to make a false use of Spinoza's denial of final causes, just as to use his assertion of the all-importance of loving God to identify him with the saints would be to make a false use of his assertion of the all-importance of loving God. He is no more to be identified with the post-Hegelian philosophers than he is to be identified with St. Augustine. Unction, indeed, Spinoza's writings have not; that name does not precisely fit any quality which they exhibit. And yet, so all-important in the sphere of religious thought is the power of edification, that in this sphere a great fame like Spinoza's can never be founded without it. A court of literature can never be very severe to Voltaire: with that inimitable wit and clear sense of his, he cannot write a page in which the fullest head may not find something suggestive: still, because, with all his wit and clear sense, he handles religious ideas wholly without the power of edification, his fame as a great man is equivocal. Strauss has treated the question of Scripture miracles with an acuteness and fulness which even to the most informed minds is instructive; but because he treats it wholly without the power of edification, his fame as a serious thinker is equivocal. But in Spinoza there is not a trace either of Voltaire's passion for mockery or of Strauss's passion for demolition. His whole soul was filled with desire of the love and knowledge of God, and of that only. Philosophy always proclaims herself on the way to the summum bonum; but too often on the road she seems to forget her destination, and suffers her hearers to forget it also. Spinoza never forgets his destination: 'The love of God is man's highest happiness and blessedness, and the final end and aim of all human actions;—The supreme reward for keeping God's Word is that Word itself—namely, to know him and with free will and pure and constant heart love him:' these sentences are the keynote to all he produced, and were the inspiration of all his labours. This is why he turns so sternly upon the worshippers of the letter,—the editors of the Masora, the editor of the Record,—because their doctrine imperils our love and knowledge of God. ‘What!’ he cries, ‘our knowledge of God to depend upon these perishable things, which Moses can dash to the ground and break to pieces like the first tables of stone, or of which the originals can be lost like the original book of the Covenant, like the original book of the Law of God, like the book of the 10 Wars of God! . . . which can come to us confused, imperfect, miswritten by copyists, tampered with by doctors! And you accuse others of impiety! It is you who are impious, to believe that God would commit the treasure of the true record of himself to any substance less enduring than the heart!’

And Spinoza’s life was not unworthy of this elevated strain. A philosopher who professed that knowledge was its own reward, a devotee who professed that the love of God was its own reward, this philosopher and this devotee 20 believed in what he said. Spinoza led a life the most spotless, perhaps, to be found among the lives of philosophers; he lived simple, studious, even-tempered, kind; declining honours, declining riches, declining notoriety. He was poor, and his admirer Simon de Vries sent him two thousand florins;—he refused them. The same friend left him his fortune;—he returned it to the heir. He was asked to dedicate one of his works to the magnificent patron of letters in his century, Louis the Fourteenth;—he declined. His great work, his Ethics, published after 30 his death, he gave injunctions to his friends to publish anonymously, for fear he should give his name to a school. Truth, he thought, should bear no man’s name. And finally,—‘Unless,’ he said, ‘I had known that my writings would in the end advance the cause of true religion, I would have suppressed them,—tacuissem.’ It was in this spirit that he lived; and this spirit gives to all he writes not exactly unction,—I have already said so,—but a kind of sacred solemnity. Not of the same order as the saints, he yet follows the same service: Doubtless thou art our Father, 40 though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not.

Therefore he has been, in a certain sphere, edifying, and has inspired in many powerful minds an interest and an admiration such as no other philosopher has inspired since Plato. The lonely precursor of German philosophy, he still shines when the light of his successors is fading away; they had celebrity, Spinoza has fame. Not because his peculiar system of philosophy has had more adherents than theirs; on the contrary, it has had fewer. But schools of philosophy arise and fall; their bands of adherents 10 inevitably dwindle; no master can long persuade a large body of disciples that they give to themselves just the same account of the world as he does; it is only the very young and the very enthusiastic who can think themselves sure that they possess the whole mind of Plato, or Spinoza, or Hegel, at all. The very mature and the very sober can even hardly believe that these philosophers possessed it themselves enough to put it all into their works, and to let us know entirely how the world seemed to them. What a remarkable philosopher really does for human thought,
20 is to throw into circulation a certain number of new and striking ideas and expressions, and to stimulate with them the thought and imagination of his century or of after-times. So Spinoza has made his distinction between adequate and inadequate ideas a current notion for educated Europe. So Hegel seized a single pregnant sentence of Heracleitus, and cast it, with a thousand striking applications, into the world of modern thought. But to do this is only enough to make a philosopher noteworthy; it is not enough to make him great. To be great, he must have 30 something in him which can influence character, which is edifying; he must, in short, have a noble and lofty character himself, a character,—to recur to that much-criticised expression of mine,—in the grand style. This is what Spinoza had; and because he had it, he stands out from the multitude of philosophers, and has been able to inspire in powerful minds a feeling which the most remarkable philosophers, without this grandiose character, could not inspire. 'There is no possible view of life but Spinoza's,' said Lessing. Goethe has told us how he was calmed and 40 edified by him in his youth, and how he again went to him for support in his maturity. Heine, the man (in spite of his faults) of truest genius that Germany has produced since Goethe,—a man with faults, as I have said, immense faults, the greatest of them being that he could reverence so little,—reverenced Spinoza. Hegel's influence ran off him like water: 'I have seen Hegel,' he cries, 'seated with his doleful air of a hatching hen upon his unhappy eggs, and I have heard his dismal clucking.—How easily one can cheat oneself into thinking that one understands everything, when one has learnt only how to construct dialectical formulas!' But of Spinoza, Heine said: 'His 10 life was a copy of the life of his divine kinsman, Jesus Christ.'

And therefore, when M. Van Vloten violently presses the parallel with the post-Hegelians, one feels that the parallel with St. Augustine is the far truer one. Compared with the soldier of irreligion M. Van Vloten would have him to be, Spinoza is religious. 'It is true,' one may say to the wise and devout Christian, 'Spinoza's conception of beatitude is not yours, and cannot satisfy you; but whose conception of beatitude would you accept as satis- 20 fying? Not even that of the devoutest of your fellow-Christians. Fra Angelico, the sweetest and most inspired of devout souls, has given us, in his great picture of the Last Judgment, his conception of beatitude. The elect are going round in a ring on long grass under laden fruit-trees; two of them, more restless than the others, are flying up a battlemented street,—a street blank with all the ennui of the Middle Ages. Across a gulf is visible, for the delectation of the saints, a blazing caldron in which Beelzebub is sousing the damned. This is hardly more 30 your conception of beatitude than Spinoza's is. But "in my Father's house are many mansions;" only, to reach any one of these mansions, there are needed the wings of a genuine sacred transport, of an "immortal longing." These wings Spinoza had; and, because he had them, his own language about himself, about his aspirations and his course, are true: his foot is in the vera vita, his eye on the beatific vision.

MARCUS AURELIUS

MR. MILL says, in his book on Liberty, that 'Christian morality is in great part merely a protest against paganism ; its ideal is negative rather than positive, passive rather than active.' He says, that, in certain most important respects, 'it falls far below the best morality of the ancients.' Now, the object of systems of morality is to take possession of human life, to save it from being abandoned to passion or allowed to drift at hazard, to give it happiness by establishing it in the practice of virtue ; and 10 this object they seek to attain by prescribing to human life fixed principles of action, fixed rules of conduct. In its uninspired as well as in its inspired moments, in its days of languor and gloom as well as in its days of sunshine and energy, human life has thus always a clue to follow, and may always be making way towards its goal. Christian morality has not failed to supply to human life aids of this sort. It has supplied them far more abundantly than many of its critics imagine. The most exquisite document, after those of the New Testament, of all the 20 documents the Christian spirit has ever inspired,—the Imitation,—by no means contains the whole of Christian morality ; nay, the disparagers of this morality would think themselves sure of triumphing if one agreed to look for it in the Imitation only. But even the Imitation is full of passages like these : ' Vita sine proposito languida et vaga est ; '—' Omni die renovare debemus propositum nostrum, dicentes : nunc hodie perfecte incipiamus, quia nihil est quod hactenus fecimus ; '—' Secundum propositum nostrum est cursus profectus nostri ; '—' Raro etiam unum
30 vitium perfecte vincimus, et ad quotidianum profectum non accendimur ; '—' Semper aliquid certi proponendum est ; '—' Tibi ipsi violentiam frequenter fac : ' (A life without a purpose is a languid, drifting thing ;—Every day we ought to renew our purpose, saying to ourselves : This day let us make a sound beginning, for what we have hitherto done is nought ;—Our improvement is in proportion to our purpose ;—We hardly ever manage to get completely rid even of one fault, and do not set our hearts on daily improvement ;—Always place a definite purpose before thee ;—Get the habit of mastering thine inclination.) These are moral precepts, and moral precepts of the best kind. As rules to hold possession of our conduct, and to keep us in the right course through outward troubles and inward perplexity, they are equal to the best ever furnished by the great 10 masters of morals,—Epictetus or Marcus Aurelius.

But moral rules, apprehended as ideas first, and then rigorously followed as laws, are, and must be, for the sage only. The mass of mankind have neither force of intellect enough to apprehend them clearly as ideas, nor force of character enough to follow them strictly as laws. The mass of mankind can be carried along a course full of hardship for the natural man, can be borne over the thousand impediments of the narrow way, only by the tide of a joyful and bounding emotion. It is impossible 20 to rise from reading Epictetus or Marcus Aurelius without a sense of restraint and melancholy, without feeling that the burden laid upon man is well-nigh greater than he can bear. Honour to the sages who have felt this, and yet have borne it! Yet, even for the sage, this sense of labour and sorrow in his march towards the goal constitutes a relative inferiority; the noblest souls of whatever creed, the pagan Empedocles as well as the Christian Paul, have insisted on the necessity of an inspiration, a joyful emotion, to make moral action perfect; an obscure indication of 30 this necessity is the one drop of truth in the ocean of verbiage with which the controversy on justification by faith has flooded the world. But, for the ordinary man, this sense of labour and sorrow constitutes an absolute disqualification; it paralyses him; under the weight of it, he cannot make way towards the goal at all. The paramount virtue of religion is, that it has lighted up morality; that it has supplied the emotion and inspiration needful for carrying the sage along the narrow way perfectly, for carrying the ordinary man along it at all. Even the 40 religions with most dross in them have had something of this virtue ; but the Christian religion manifests it with unexampled splendour. 'Lead me, Zeus and Destiny!' says the prayer of Epictetus, 'whithersoever I am appointed to go ; I will follow without wavering ; even though I turn coward and shrink, I shall have to follow all the same.' The fortitude of that is for the strong, for the few ; even for them the spiritual atmosphere with which it surrounds them is bleak and grey. But, 'Let thy loving spirit lead me forth into the land of righteousness ;'—'The Lord 10 shall be unto thee an everlasting light, and thy God thy glory ;'—'Unto you that fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings,' says the Old Testament ; 'Born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God ;'—'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God ;'—'Whatsoever is born of God, overcometh the world,' says the New. The ray of sunshine is there, the glow of a divine warmth ;—the austerity of the sage melts away under it, the paralysis of the weak is healed : he who is 20 vivified by it renews his strength ; 'all things are possible to him ;' 'he is a new creature.'

Epictetus says : 'Every matter has two handles, one of which will bear taking hold of, the other not. If thy brother sin against thee, lay not hold of the matter by this, that he sins against thee ; for by this handle the matter will not bear taking hold of. But rather lay hold of it by this, that he is thy brother, thy born mate ; and thou wilt take hold of it by what will bear handling.' Jesus, asked whether a man is bound to forgive his brother 30 as often as seven times, answers : 'I say not unto thee, until seven times, but until seventy times seven.' Epictetus here suggests to the reason grounds for forgiveness of injuries which Jesus does not ; but it is vain to say that Epictetus is on that account a better moralist than Jesus, if the warmth, the emotion, of Jesus's answer fires his hearer to the practice of forgiveness of injuries, while the thought in Epictetus's leaves him cold. So with Christian morality in general : its distinction is not that it propounds the maxim, 'Thou shalt love God and thy this maxim with an inspiration which wonderfully catches the hearer and makes him act upon it. It is because Mr. Mill has attained to the perception of truths of this nature, that he is,—instead of being, like the school from which he proceeds, doomed to sterility,—a writer of distinguished mark and influence, a writer deserving all attention and respect; it is (I must be pardoned for saying) because he is not sufficiently leavened with them, that he falls just short of being a great writer.
 40 neighbour,' with more development, closer reasoning, truer sincerity, than other moral systems ; it is that it propounds

That which gives to the moral writings of the Emperor 10 Marcus Aurelius their peculiar character and charm, is their being suffused and softened by something of this very sentiment whence Christian morality draws its best power. Mr. Long has recently published in a convenient form a translation of these writings, and has thus enabled English readers to judge Marcus Aurelius for themselves; he has rendered his countrymen a real service by so doing. Mr. Long's reputation as a scholar is a sufficient guarantee of the general fidelity and accuracy of his translation; on these matters, besides, I am hardly entitled to speak, 20 and my praise is of no value. But that for which I and the rest of the unlearned may venture to praise Mr. Long is this: that he treats Marcus Aurelius's writings, as he treats all the other remains of Greek and Roman antiquity which he touches, not as a dead and dry matter of learning, but as documents with a side of modern applicability and living interest, and valuable mainly so far as this side in them can be made clear; that as in his notes on Plutarch's Roman Lives he deals with the modern epoch of Caesar and Cicero, not as food for schoolboys, but as food for men, 30 and men engaged in the current of contemporary life and action, so in his remarks and essays on Marcus Aurelius he treats this truly modern striver and thinker not as a Classical Dictionary hero, but as a present source from which to draw 'example of life, and instruction of manners.' Why may not a son of Dr. Arnold say, what might naturally here be said by any other critic, that in this lively and fruitful way of considering the men and affairs of ancient Greece and Rome, Mr. Long resembles Dr. Arnold?

One or two little complaints, however, I have against 40 Mr. Long, and I will get them off my mind at once. In the first place, why could he not have found gentler and juster terms to describe the translation of his best-known predecessor, Jeremy Collier,—the redoubtable enemy of stage plays,—than these: ‘a most coarse and vulgar copy of the original’? As a matter of taste, a translator should deal leniently with his predecessor; but putting that out of the question, Mr. Long’s language is a great deal too hard. Most English people who knew Marcus Aurelius before Mr. Long appeared as his introducer, knew him 10 through Jeremy Collier. And the acquaintance of a man like Marcus Aurelius is such an imperishable benefit, that one can never lose a peculiar sense of obligation towards the man who confers it. Apart from this claim upon one’s tenderness, however, Jeremy Collier’s version deserves respect for its genuine spirit and vigour, the spirit and vigour of the age of Dryden. Jeremy Collier too, like Mr. Long, regarded in Marcus Aurelius the living moralist, and not the dead classic; and his warmth of feeling gave to his style an impetuosity and rhythm which from Mr.

 20 Long’s style (I do not blame it on that account) are absent.

Let us place the two side by side. The impressive opening of Marcus Aurelius’s fifth book, Mr. Long translates thus:—

‘In the morning when thou risest unwillingly, let this thought be present: I am rising to the work of a human being. Why then am I dissatisfied if I am going to do the things for which I exist and for which I was brought into the world? Or have I been made for this, to lie in the bed-clothes and keep myself warm?—But this is more pleasant.—Dost thou exist then to take thy pleasure, and 30 not at all for action or exertion?’

Jeremy Collier has:—

‘When you find an unwillingness to rise early in the morning, make this short speech to yourself: “I am getting up now to do the business of a man; and am I out of humour for going about that which I was made for, and for the sake of which I was sent into the world? Was I then designed for nothing but to doze and batten beneath the counterpane? I thought action had been the end of your being.”’

40 In another striking passage, again, Mr. Long has:—

‘No longer wander at hazard; for neither wilt thou read thy own memoirs, nor the acts of the ancient Romans and Hellenes, and the selections from books which thou wast reserving for thy old age. Hasten then to the end which thou hast before thee, and, throwing away idle hopes, come to thine own aid, if thou carest at all for thyself, while it is in thy power.'

Here his despised predecessor has :—

'Don't go too far in your books and overgrasp yourself. Alas, you have no time left to peruse your diary, to read over the Greek and Roman history : come, don't flatter 10 and deceive yourself ; look to the main chance, to the end and design of reading, and mind life more than notion : I say, if you have a kindness for your person, drive at the practice and help yourself, for that is in your own power.'

It seems to me that here for style and force Jeremy Collier can (to say the least) perfectly stand comparison with Mr. Long. Jeremy Collier's real defect as a translator is not his coarseness and vulgarity, but his imperfect acquaintance with Greek ; this is a serious defect, a fatal one ; it renders a translation like Mr. Long's necessary. 20 Jeremy Collier's work will now be forgotten, and Mr. Long stands master of the field ; but he may be content, at any rate, to leave his predecessor's grave unharmed, even if he will not throw upon it, in passing, a handful of kindly earth.

Another complaint I have against Mr. Long is, that he is not quite idiomatic and simple enough. It is a little formal, at least, if not pedantic, to say Ethic and Dialectic, instead of Ethics and Dialectics, and to say, 'Hellenes and Romans' instead of 'Greeks and Romans.' And why, too, 30 —the name of Antoninus being preoccupied by Antoninus Pius,—will Mr. Long call his author Marcus Antoninus instead of Marcus Aurelius ? Small as these matters appear, they are important when one has to deal with the general public, and not with a small circle of scholars ; and it is the general public that the translator of a short masterpiece on morals, such as is the book of Marcus Aurelius, should have in view ; his aim should be to make Marcus Aurelius's work as popular as the Imitation, and Marcus Aurelius's name as familiar as Socrates's. In 40 rendering or naming him, therefore, punctilious accuracy of phrase is not so much to be sought as accessibility and currency ; everything which may best enable the Emperor and his precepts volitare per ora virum. It is essential to render him in language perfectly plain and unprofessional, and to call him by the name by which he is best and most distinctly known. The translators of the Bible talk of pence and not denarii, and the admirers of Voltaire do not celebrate him under the name of Arouet.

But, after these trifling complaints are made, one must 10 end, as one began, in unfeigned gratitude to Mr. Long for his excellent and substantial reproduction in English of an invaluable work. In general the substantiality, soundness, and precision of Mr. Long's rendering are (I will venture, after all, to give my opinion about them) as conspicuous as the living spirit with which he treats antiquity ; and these qualities are particularly desirable in the translator of a work like Marcus Aurelius's, of which the language is often corrupt, almost always hard and obscure. Any one
20 who wants to appreciate Mr. Long's merits as a translator may read, in the original and in Mr. Long's translation, the seventh chapter of the tenth book ; he will see how, through all the dubiousness and involved manner of the Greek, Mr. Long has firmly seized upon the clear thought which is certainly at the bottom of that troubled wording, and, in distinctly rendering this thought, has at the same time thrown round its expression a characteristic shade of painfulness and difficulty which just suits it. And Marcus Aurelius's book is one which, when it is rendered so accurately as Mr. Long renders it, even those who know Greek 30 tolerably well may choose to read rather in the translation than in the original. For not only are the contents here incomparably more valuable than the external form, but this form, the Greek of a Roman, is not exactly one of those styles which have a physiognomy, which are an essential part of their author, which stamp an indelible impression of him on the reader's mind. An old Lyons commentator finds, indeed, in Marcus Aurelius's Greek, something characteristic, something specially firm and imperial ; but I think an ordinary mortal will hardly find 40 this : he will find crabbed Greek, without any great charm of distinct physiognomy. The Greek of Thucydides and Plato has this charm, and he who reads them in a translation, however accurate, loses it, and loses much in losing it; but the Greek of Marcus Aurelius, like the Greek of the New Testament, and even more than the Greek of the New Testament, is wanting in it. If one could be assured that the English Testament were made perfectly accurate, one might be almost content never to open a Greek Testament again; and, Mr. Long's version of Marcus Aurelius being what it is, an Englishman who reads to live, and does not live to read, may henceforth let the Greek original 10 repose upon its shelf.

The man whose thoughts Mr. Long has thus faithfully reproduced, is perhaps the most beautiful figure in history. He is one of those consoling and hope-inspiring marks, which stand for ever to remind our weak and easily discouraged race how high human goodness and perseverance have once been carried, and may be carried again. The interest of mankind is peculiarly attracted by examples of signal goodness in high places; for that testimony to the worth of goodness is the most striking which is borne 20 by those to whom all the means of pleasure and self-indulgence lay open, by those who had at their command the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. Marcus Aurelius was the ruler of the grandest of empires; and he was one of the best of men. Besides him, history presents one or two other sovereigns eminent for their goodness, such as Saint Louis or Alfred. But Marcus Aurelius has, for us moderns, this great superiority in interest over Saint Louis or Alfred, that he lived and acted in a state of society modern by its essential characteristics, in an 30 epoch akin to our own, in a brilliant centre of civilisation. Trajan talks of 'our enlightened age' just as glibly as the Times talks of it. Marcus Aurelius thus becomes for us a man like ourselves, a man in all things tempted as we are. Saint Louis inhabits an atmosphere of mediaeval Catholicism, which the man of the nineteenth century may admire, indeed, may even passionately wish to inhabit, but which, strive as he will, he cannot really inhabit: Alfred belongs to a state of society (I say it with all deference to the Saturday Review critic who keeps such jealous watch 40 over the honour of our Saxon ancestors) half barbarous.

Neither Alfred nor Saint Louis can be morally and intellectually as near to us as Marcus Aurelius.

The record of the outward life of this admirable man has in it little of striking incident. He was born at Rome on the 26th of April, in the year 121 of the Christian era. He was nephew and son-in-law to his predecessor on the throne, Antoninus Pius. When Antoninus died, he was forty years old, but from the time of his earliest manhood he had assisted in administering public affairs. Then, after 10 his uncle's death in 161, for nineteen years he reigned as emperor. The barbarians were pressing on the Roman frontier, and a great part of Marcus Aurelius's nineteen years of reign was passed in campaigning. His absences from Rome were numerous and long: we hear of him in Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, Greece; but, above all, in the countries on the Danube, where the war with the barbarians was going on,—in Austria, Moravia, Hungary. In these countries much of his Journal seems to have been written; parts of it are dated from them; and there, a few weeks 20 before his fifty-ninth birthday, he fell sick and died.<sup>1</sup> The record of him on which his fame chiefly rests is the record of his inward life,—his Journal, or Commentaries, or Meditations, or Thoughts, for by all these names has the work been called. Perhaps the most interesting of the records of his outward life is that which the first book of this work supplies, where he gives an account of his education, recites the names of those to whom he is indebted for it, and enumerates his obligations to each of them. It is a refreshing and consoling picture, a priceless treasure for those,
 30 who, sick of the 'wild and dreamlike trade of blood and guile,' which seems to be nearly the whole of what history has to offer to our view, seek eagerly for that substratum of right thinking and well-doing which in all ages must surely have somewhere existed, for without it the continued life of humanity would have been impossible. 'From my mother I learnt piety and beneficence, and abstinence not only from evil deeds but even from evil thoughts; and further, simplicity in my way of living, far removed from the habits of the rich.' Let us remember that, the next time we are reading the sixth satire of Juvenal. 'From my tutor I learnt' (hear it, ye tutors of princes!) 'endurance of labour, and to want little, and to work with my own hands, and not to meddle with other people's affairs, and not to be ready to listen to slander.' The vices and foibles of the Greek sophist or rhetorician—the Graeculus esuriens—are in everybody's mind; but he who reads Marcus Aurelius's account of his Greek teachers and masters, will understand how it is that, in spite of the vices and foibles of individual Graeculi, the education of the human race owes to Greece 10 a debt which can never be overrated. The vague and colourless praise of history leaves on the mind hardly any impression of Antoninus Pius: it is only from the private memoranda of his nephew that we learn what a disciplined, hard-working, gentle, wise, virtuous man he was; a man who, perhaps, interests mankind less than his immortal nephew only because he has left in writing no record of his inner life,—caret quia vate sacro.

<sup>1</sup> He died on the 17th of March, A.D. 180.

Of the outward life and circumstances of Marcus Aurelius, beyond these notices which he has himself supplied, there 20 are few of much interest and importance. There is the fine anecdote of his speech when he heard of the assassination of the revolted Avidius Cassius, against whom he was marching; he was sorry, he said, to be deprived of the pleasure of pardoning him. And there are one or two more anecdotes of him which show the same spirit. But the great record for the outward life of a man who has left such a record of his lofty inward aspirations as that which Marcus Aurelius has left, is the clear consenting voice of all his contemporaries,—high and low, friend and enemy, 30 pagan and Christian,—in praise of his sincerity, justice, and goodness. The world's charity does not err on the side of excess, and here was a man occupying the most conspicuous station in the world, and professing the highest possible standard of conduct;—yet the world was obliged to declare that he walked worthily of his profession. Long after his death, his bust was to be seen in the houses of private men through the wide Roman empire: it may be the vulgar part of human nature which busies itself with the semblance and doings of living sovereigns, it is its nobler 40 part which busies itself with those of the dead; these busts of Marcus Aurelius, in the homes of Gaul, Britain, and Italy, bore witness, not to the inmates' frivolous curiosity about princes and palaces, but to their reverential memory of the passage of a great man upon the earth.

Two things, however, before one turns from the outward to the inward life of Marcus Aurelius, force themselves upon one's notice, and demand a word of comment; he persecuted the Christians, and he had for his son the vicious and brutal Commodus. The persecution at 10 Lyons, in which Attalus and Pothinus suffered, the persecution at Smyrna, in which Polycarp suffered, took place in his reign. Of his humanity, of his tolerance, of his horror of cruelty and violence, of his wish to refrain from severe measures against the Christians, of his anxiety to temper the severity of these measures when they appeared to him indispensable, there is no doubt: but, on the one hand, it is certain that the letter, attributed to him, directing that no Christian should be punished for being a Christian, is spurious; it is almost certain that his 20 alleged answer to the authorities of Lyons, in which he directs that Christians persisting in their profession shall be dealt with according to law, is genuine. Mr. Long seems inclined to try and throw doubt over the persecution at Lyons, by pointing out that the letter of the Lyons Christians relating it, alleges it to have been attended by miraculous and incredible incidents. 'A man,' he says, 'can only act consistently by accepting all this letter or rejecting it all, and we cannot blame him for either.' But it is contrary to all experience to say that because a fact 30 is related with incorrect additions and embellishments, therefore it probably never happened at all; or that it is not, in general, easy for an impartial mind to distinguish between the fact and the embellishments. I cannot doubt that the Lyons persecution took place, and that the punishment of Christians for being Christians was sanctioned by Marcus Aurelius. But then I must add that nine modern readers out of ten, when they read this, will, I believe, have a perfectly false notion of what the moral action of Marcus Aurelius, in sanctioning that punishment, really 40 was. They imagine Trajan, or Antoninus Pius, or Marcus Aurelius, fresh from the perusal of the Gospel, fully aware of the spirit and holiness of the Christian saints, ordering their extermination because he loved darkness rather than light. Far from this, the Christianity which these emperors aimed at repressing was, in their conception of it, something philosophically contemptible, politically subversive, and morally abominable. As men, they sincerely regarded it much as well-conditioned people, with us, regard Mormonism; as rulers, they regarded it much as Liberal statesmen, with us, regard the Jesuits. A kind of Mormonism, constituted as a vast secret society, with obscure aims of 10 political and social subversion, was what Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius believed themselves to be repressing when they punished Christians. The early Christian apologists again and again declare to us under what odious imputations the Christians lay, how general was the belief that these imputations were well-grounded, how sincere was the horror which the belief inspired. The multitude, convinced that the Christians were atheists who ate human flesh and thought incest no crime, displayed against them a fury 20 so passionate as to embarrass and alarm their rulers. The severe expressions of Tacitus, exitiabilis superstitio—odio humani generis convicti, show how deeply the prejudices of the multitude imbued the educated class also. One asks oneself with astonishment how a doctrine so benign as that of Christ can have incurred misrepresentation so monstrous. The inner and moving cause of the misrepresentation lay, no doubt, in this,—that Christianity was a new spirit in the Roman world, destined to act in that world as its dissolvent; and it was inevitable that Christianity in the Roman world, like democracy in the modern 30 world, like every new spirit with a similar mission assigned to it, should at its first appearance occasion an instinctive shrinking and repugnance in the world which it was to dissolve. The outer and palpable causes of the misrepresentation were, for the Roman public at large, the confounding of the Christians with the Jews, that isolated, fierce, and stubborn race, whose stubbornness, fierceness, and isolation, real as they were, the fancy of a civilised Roman yet further exaggerated; the atmosphere of mystery and novelty which surrounded the Christian 40 rites; the very simplicity of Christian theism;—for the Roman statesman, the character of secret assemblages which the meetings of the Christian community wore, under a State-system as jealous of unauthorised associations as the State-system of modern France.

A Roman of Marcus Aurelius's time and position could not well see the Christians except through the mist of these prejudices. Seen through such a mist, the Christians appeared with a thousand faults not their own: but it has not been sufficiently remarked that faults, really their 10 own, many of them assuredly appeared with besides, faults especially likely to strike such an observer as Marcus Aurelius, and to confirm him in the prejudices of his race, station, and rearing. We look back upon Christianity after it has proved what a future it bore within it, and for us the sole representatives of its early struggles are the pure and devoted spirits through whom it proved this; Marcus Aurelius saw it with its future yet unshown, and with the tares among its professed progeny not less conspicuous than the wheat. Who can doubt that among the professing Chris-
20 tians of the second century, as among the professing Christians of the nineteenth, there was plenty of folly, plenty of rabid nonsense, plenty of gross fanaticism? who will even venture to affirm that, separated in great measure from the intellect and civilisation of the world for one or two centuries, Christianity, wonderful as have been its fruits, had the development perfectly worthy of its inestimable germ? Who will venture to affirm that, by the alliance of Christianity with the virtue and intelligence of men like the Antonines,—of the best product of Greek and 30 Roman civilisation, while Greek and Roman civilisation had yet life and power,—Christianity and the world, as well as the Antonines themselves, would not have been gainers? That alliance was not to be;—the Antonines lived and died with an utter misconception of Christianity; Christianity grew up in the Catacombs, not on the Palatine. Marcus Aurelius incurs no moral reproach by having authorised the punishment of the Christians; he does not thereby become in the least what we mean by a 40 persecutor. One may concede that it was impossible for him to see Christianity as it really was;—as impossible as for even the moderate and sensible Fleury to see the Antonines as they really were ;—one may concede that the point of view from which Christianity appeared something anti-civil and anti-social, which the State had the faculty to judge and the duty to suppress, was inevitably his. Still, however, it remains true, that this sage, who made perfection his aim and reason his law, did Christianity an immense injustice, and rested in an idea of State-attributes which was illusive. And this is, in truth, characteristic of Marcus Aurelius, that he is blameless, yet, in a certain sense, unfortunate ; in his character, 10 beautiful as it is, there is something melancholy, circumscribed, and ineffectual.

For of his having such a son as Commodus, too, one must say that he is not to be blamed on that account, but that he is unfortunate. Disposition and temperament are inexplicable things ; there are natures on which the best education and example are thrown away ; excellent fathers may have, without any fault of theirs, incurably vicious sons. It is to be remembered, also, that Commodus was left, at the perilous age of nineteen, master of the world ; 20 while his father, at that age, was but beginning a twenty years' apprenticeship to wisdom, labour, and self-command, under the sheltering teachership of his uncle Antoninus. Commodus was a prince apt to be led by favourites ; and if the story is true which says that he left, all through his reign, the Christians untroubled, and ascribes this lenity to the influence of his mistress Marcia, it shows that he could be led to good as well as to evil ;—for such a nature to be left at a critical age with absolute power, and wholly without good counsel and direction, was the more fatal. 30 Still one cannot help wishing that the example of Marcus Aurelius could have availed more with his own only son ; one cannot but think that with such virtue as his there should go, too, the ardour which removes mountains, and that the ardour which removes mountains might have even won Commodus : the word ineffectual again rises to one's mind ; Marcus Aurelius saved his own soul by his righteousness, and he could do no more. Happy they, who can do this ! but still happier, who can do more !

Yet, when one passes from his outward to his inward 40 life, when one turns over the pages of his Meditations,— entries jotted down from day to day, amid the business of the city or the fatigues of the camp, for his own guidance and support, meant for no eye but his own, without the slightest attempt at style, with no care, even, for correct writing, not to be surpassed for naturalness and sincerity,—all disposition to carp and cavil dies away, and one is overpowered by the charm of a character of such purity, delicacy, and virtue. He fails neither in small things nor in great; he keeps watch over himself both that the 10 great springs of action may be right in him, and that the minute details of action may be right also. How admirable in a hard-tasked ruler, and a ruler, too, with a passion for thinking and reading, is such a memorandum as the following :—

‘Not frequently nor without necessity to say to any one, or to write in a letter, that I have no leisure; nor continually to excuse the neglect of duties required by our relation to those with whom we live, by alleging urgent occupation.’

20 And, when that ruler is a Roman emperor, what an ‘idea’ is this to be written down and meditated by him :—

‘The idea of a polity in which there is the same law for all, a polity administered with regard to equal rights and equal freedom of speech, and the idea of a kingly government which respects most of all the freedom of the governed.’

And, for all men who ‘drive at practice,’ what practical rules may not one accumulate out of these Meditations :—

30 ‘The greatest part of what we say or do being unnecessary, if a man takes this away, he will have more leisure and less uneasiness. Accordingly, on every occasion a man should ask himself: “Is this one of the unnecessary things?” Now a man should take away not only unnecessary acts, but also unnecessary thoughts, for thus superfluous acts will not follow after.’

And again :—

40 ‘We ought to check in the series of our thoughts everything that is without a purpose and useless, but most of all the over-curious feeling and the malignant; and a man should use himself to think of those things only about which if one should suddenly ask, “What hast thou now in thy thoughts ? ” with perfect openness thou mightest immediately answer, “ This or That ; ” so that from thy words it should be plain that everything in thee is simple and benevolent, and such as befits a social animal, and one that cares not for thoughts about sensual enjoyments, or any rivalry or envy and suspicion, or anything else for which thou wouldst blush if thou shouldst say thou hadst it in thy mind.’

So, with a stringent practicalness worthy of Franklin, he discourses on his favourite text, Let nothing be done 10 without a purpose. But it is when he enters the region where Franklin cannot follow him, when he utters his thoughts on the ground-motives of human action, that he is most interesting ;—that he becomes the unique, the incomparable Marcus Aurelius. Christianity uses language very liable to be misunderstood when it seems to tell men to do good, not, certainly, from the vulgar motives of worldly interest, or vanity, or love of human praise, but that ‘ their Father which seeth in secret may reward them openly.’ The motives of reward and punishment have 20 come, from the misconception of language of this kind, to be strangely overpressed by many Christian moralists, to the deterioration and disfigurement of Christianity. Marcus Aurelius says, truly and nobly :—

‘ One man, when he has done a service to another, is ready to set it down to his account as a favour conferred. Another is not ready to do this, but still in his own mind he thinks of the man as his debtor, and he knows what he has done. A third in a manner does not even know what he has done, but he is like a vine which has produced grapes, 30 and seeks for nothing more after it has once produced its proper fruit. As a horse when he has run, a dog when he has caught the game, a bee when it has made its honey, so a man when he has done a good act, does not call out for others to come and see, but he goes on to another act, as a vine goes on to produce again the grapes in season. Must a man, then, be one of these, who in a manner acts thus without observing it ? Yes.’

And again :—

‘ What more dost thou want when thou hast done a man 40 a service ? Art thou not content that thou hast done something conformable to thy nature, and dost thou seek to be paid for it, just as if the eye demanded a recompense for seeing, or the feet for walking?'

Christianity, in order to match morality of this strain, has to correct its apparent offers of external reward, and to say: The kingdom of God is within you.

I have said that it is by its accent of emotion that the morality of Marcus Aurelius acquires a special character, and reminds one of Christian morality. The sentences of 10 Seneca are stimulating to the intellect; the sentences of Epictetus are fortifying to the character; the sentences of Marcus Aurelius find their way to the soul. I have said that religious emotion has the power to light up morality: the emotion of Marcus Aurelius does not quite light up his morality, but it suffuses it; it has not power to melt the clouds of effort and austerity quite away, but it shines through them and glorifies them; it is a spirit, not so much of gladness and elation, as of gentleness and sweetness; a delicate and tender sentiment, which is less
 20 than joy and more than resignation. He says that in his youth he learned from Maximus, one of his teachers, 'cheerfulness in all circumstances as well as in illness; and a just admixture in the moral character of sweetness and dignity:' and it is this very admixture of sweetness with his dignity which makes him so beautiful a moralist. It enables him to carry even into his observation of nature a delicate penetration, a sympathetic tenderness, worthy of Wordsworth; the spirit of such a remark as the following has hardly a parallel, so far as my knowledge goes, in the whole
 30 range of Greek and Roman literature:—

'Figs, when they are quite ripe, gape open; and in the ripe olives the very circumstance of their being near to rottenness adds a peculiar beauty to the fruit. And the ears of corn bending down, and the lion's eyebrows, and the foam which flows from the mouth of wild boars, and many other things,—though they are far from being beautiful, in a certain sense,—still, because they come in the course of nature, have a beauty in them, and they please the mind; so that if a man should have a feeling 40 and a deeper insight with respect to the things which are produced in the universe, there is hardly anything which comes in the course of nature which will not seem to him to be in a manner disposed so as to give pleasure.'

But it is when his strain passes to directly moral subjects that his delicacy and sweetness lend to it the greatest charm. Let those who can feel the beauty of spiritual refinement read this, the reflection of an emperor who prized mental superiority highly :—

'Thou sayest, "Men cannot admire the sharpness of thy wits." Be it so ; but there are many other things of which thou canst not say, "I am not formed for them by nature." Show those qualities, then, which are altogether in thy power,—sincerity, gravity, endurance of labour, aversion to pleasure, contentment with thy portion and with few things, benevolence, frankness, no love of superfluity, freedom from trifling, magnanimity. Dost thou not see how many qualities thou art at once able to exhibit, as to which there is no excuse of natural incapacity and unfitness, and yet thou still remainest voluntarily below the mark ? Or art thou compelled, through being defectively furnished by nature, to murmur, and to be mean, and to flatter, and to find fault with thy poor body, and to try to please men, and to make great display, and to be so restless in thy mind ? No, indeed ; but thou mightest have been delivered from these things long ago. Only, if in truth thou canst be charged with being rather slow and dull of comprehension, thou must exert thyself about this also, not neglecting nor yet taking pleasure in thy dulness.'

The same sweetness enables him to fix his mind, when he sees the isolation and moral death caused by sin, not on the cheerless thought of the misery of this condition, but on the inspiriting thought that man is blest with the power to escape from it :—

'Suppose that thou hast detached thyself from the natural unity,—for thou wast made by nature a part, but now thou hast cut thyself off,—yet here is this beautiful provision, that it is in thy power again to unite thyself. God has allowed this to no other part,—after it has been separated and cut asunder, to come together again. But consider the goodness with which he has privileged man ; for he has put it in his power, when he has been separated, to return and to be united and to resume his place.'

It enables him to control even the passion for retreat and solitude, so strong in a soul like his, to which the world could offer no abiding city :—

‘ Men seek retreat for themselves, houses in the country, sea-shores, and mountains ; and thou, too, art wont to desire such things very much. But this is altogether a mark of the most common sort of men, for it is in thy power whenever thou shalt choose to retire into thyself. For nowhere either with more quiet or more freedom from 10 trouble does a man retire than into his own soul, particularly when he has within him such thoughts that by looking into them he is immediately in perfect tranquillity. Constantly, then, give to thyself this retreat, and renew thyself ; and let thy principles be brief and fundamental, which, as soon as thou shalt recur to them, will be sufficient to cleanse the soul completely, and to send thee back free from all discontent with the things to which thou returnest.’

Against this feeling of discontent and weariness, so natural to the great for whom there seems nothing left 20 to desire or to strive after, but so enfeebling to them, so deteriorating, Marcus Aurelius never ceased to struggle. With resolute thankfulness he kept in remembrance the blessings of his lot ; the true blessings of it, not the false :—

‘ I have to thank Heaven that I was subjected to a ruler and a father (Antoninus Pius) who was able to take away all pride from me, and to bring me to the knowledge that it is possible for a man to live in a palace without either guards, or embroidered dresses, or any show of this kind ; but that it is in such a man’s power to bring himself very 30 near to the fashion of a private person, without being for this reason either meaner in thought or more remiss in action with respect to the things which must be done for public interest. . . . I have to be thankful that my children have not been stupid nor deformed in body ; that I did not make more proficiency in rhetoric, poetry, and the other studies, by which I should perhaps have been completely engrossed, if I had seen that I was making great progress in them ; . . . that I knew Apollonius, Rusticus, Maximus ; . . . that I received clear and frequent impressions about 40 living according to nature, and what kind of a life that is, so that, so far as depended on Heaven, and its gifts, help, and inspiration, nothing hindered me from forthwith living according to nature, though I still fall short of it through my own fault, and through not observing the admonitions of Heaven, and, I may almost say, its direct instructions; that my body has held out so long in such a kind of life as mine; that though it was my mother's lot to die young, she spent the last years of her life with me; that whenever I wished to help any man in his need, I was never told that I had not the means of doing it; that, when I had an inclination to philosophy, I did not 10 fall into the hands of a sophist.'

And, as he dwelt with gratitude on these helps and blessings vouchsafed to him, his mind (so, at least, it seems to me) would sometimes revert with awe to the perils and temptations of the lonely height where he stood, to the lives of Tiberius, Caligula, Nero, Domitian, in their hideous blackness and ruin; and then he wrote down for himself such a warning entry as this, significant and terrible in its abruptness:—

'A black character, a womanish character, a stubborn 20 character, bestial, childish, animal, stupid, counterfeit, scurrilous, fraudulent, tyrannical!'

Or this:—

'About what am I now employing my soul? On every occasion I must ask myself this question, and enquire, What have I now in this part of me which they call the ruling principle, and whose soul have I now?—that of a child, or of a young man, or of a weak woman, or of a tyrant, or of one of the lower animals in the service of man, or of a wild beast?' 30

The character he wished to attain he knew well, and beautifully he has marked it, and marked, too, his sense of shortcoming:—

'When thou hast assumed these names,—good, modest, true, rational, equal-minded, magnanimous,—take care that thou dost not change these names; and, if thou shouldst lose them, quickly return to them. If thou maintainest thyself in possession of these names without desiring that others should call thee by them, thou wilt be another being, and wilt enter on another life. For to 40 continue to be such as thou hast hitherto been, and to be torn in pieces and defiled in such a life, is the character of a very stupid man, and one overfond of his life, and like those half-devoured fighters with wild beasts, who though covered with wounds and gore still entreat to be kept to the following day, though they will be exposed in the same state to the same claws and bites. Therefore fix thyself in the possession of these few names : and if thou art able to abide in them, abide as if thou wast removed to the Happy Islands.'

For all his sweetness and serenity, however, man's 10 point of life 'between two infinities' (of that expression Marcus Aurelius is the real owner) was to him anything but a Happy Island, and the performances on it he saw through no veils of illusion. Nothing is in general more gloomy and monotonous than declamations on the hollowness and transitoriness of human life and grandeur : but here, too, the great charm of Marcus Aurelius, his emotion, comes in to relieve the monotony and to break through the gloom ; and even on this eternally used topic he is imaginative, fresh, and striking :—

20 'Consider, for example, the times of Vespasian. Thou wilt see all these things, people marrying, bringing up children, sick, dying, warring, feasting, trafficking, cultivating the ground, flattering, obstinately arrogant, suspecting, plotting, wishing for somebody to die, grumbling about the present, loving, heaping up treasure, desiring to be consuls or kings. Well then, that life of these people no longer exists at all. Again, go to the times of Trajan. All is again the same. Their life too is gone. But chiefly thou shouldst think of those whom thou hast thyself known distracting 30 themselves about idle things, neglecting to do what was in accordance with their proper constitution, and to hold firmly to this and to be content with it.'

Again :—

'The things which are much valued in life are empty, and rotten, and trifling ; and people are like little dogs biting one another, and little children quarrelling, crying, and then straightway laughing. But fidelity, and modesty, and justice, and truth, are fled

Up to Olympus from the wide-spread earth.

40 What then is there which still detains thee here ?'

And once more :—

'Look down from above on the countless herds of men, and their countless solemnities, and the infinitely varied voyagings in storms and calms, and the differences among those who are born, who live together, and die. And consider too the life lived by others in olden time, and the life now lived among barbarous nations, and how many know not even thy name, and how many will soon forget it, and how they who perhaps now are praising thee will very soon blame thee, and that neither a posthu- 10 mous name is of any value, nor reputation, nor anything else.'

He recognised, indeed, that (to use his own words) 'the prime principle in man's constitution is the social ;' and he laboured sincerely to make not only his acts towards his fellow-men, but his thoughts also, suitable to this conviction :—

'When thou wishest to delight thyself, think of the virtues of those who live with thee ; for instance, the activity of one, and the modesty of another, and the 20 liberality of a third, and some other good quality of a fourth.'

Still, it is hard for a pure and thoughtful man to live in a state of rapture at the spectacle afforded to him by his fellow-creatures ; above all it is hard, when such a man is placed as Marcus Aurelius was placed, and has had the meanness and perversity of his fellow-creatures thrust, in no common measure, upon his notice,—has had, time after time, to experience how 'within ten days thou wilt seem a god to those to whom thou art now a beast and an 30 ape.' His true strain of thought as to his relations with his fellow-men is rather the following. He has been enumerating the higher consolations which may support a man at the approach of death, and he goes on :—

'But if thou requirest also a vulgar kind of comfort which shall reach thy heart, thou wilt be made best reconciled to death by observing the objects from which thou art going to be removed, and the morals of those with whom thy soul will no longer be mingled. For it is no way right to be offended with men, but it is thy duty 40 to care for them and to bear with them gently ; and yet to remember that thy departure will not be from men who have the same principles as thyself. For this is the only thing, if there be any, which could draw us the contrary way and attach us to life, to be permitted to live with those who have the same principles as ourselves. But now thou seest how great is the distress caused by the difference of those who live together, so that thou mayest say: "Come quick, O death, lest perchance I too should forget myself."

10 O faithless and perverse generation! how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you? Sometimes this strain rises even to passion:—

'Short is the little which remains to thee of life. Live as on a mountain. Let men see, let them know, a real man, who lives as he was meant to live. If they cannot endure him, let them kill him. For that is better than to live as men do.'

It is remarkable how little of a merely local and temporary character, how little of those scoriae which a reader
20 has to clear away before he gets to the precious ore, how little that even admits of doubt or question, the morality of Marcus Aurelius exhibits. Perhaps as to one point we must make an exception. Marcus Aurelius is fond of urging as a motive for man's cheerful acquiescence in whatever befalls him, that 'whatever happens to every man is for the interest of the universal;' that the whole contains nothing which is not for its advantage; that everything which happens to a man is to be accepted, 'even if it seems disagreeable, because it leads to the health of the universe.'
30 And the whole course of the universe, he adds, has a providential reference to man's welfare: 'all other things have been made for the sake of rational beings.' Religion has in all ages freely used this language, and it is not religion which will object to Marcus Aurelius's use of it; but science can hardly accept as severely accurate this employment of the terms interest and advantage. Even to a sound nature and a clear reason the proposition that things happen 'for the interest of the universal,' as men conceive of interest, may seem to have no meaning at all, and the proposition 40 that 'all things have been made for the sake of rational beings' may seem to be false. Yet even to this language, not irresistibly cogent when it is thus absolutely used, Marcus Aurelius gives a turn which makes it true and useful, when he says: 'The ruling part of man can make a material for itself out of that which opposes it, as fire lays hold of what falls into it, and rises higher by means of this very material;'—when he says: 'What else are all things except exercises for the reason? Persevere then until thou shalt have made all things thine own, as the stomach which is strengthened makes all things its own, as the blazing fire makes flame and brightness out of everything that is thrown into it;'—when he says: 'Thou wilt not cease to be miserable till thy mind is in such a condition, that, what luxury is to those who enjoy pleasure, such shall be to thee, in every matter which presents itself, the doing of the things which are conformable to man's constitution; for a man ought to consider as an enjoyment everything which it is in his power to do according to his own nature,—and it is in his power everywhere.' In this sense it is, indeed, most true that 'all things have been made for the sake of rational beings;' that 'all things work together for good.'

In general, however, the action Marcus Aurelius prescribes is action which every sound nature must recognise as right, and the motives he assigns are motives which every clear reason must recognise as valid. And so he remains the especial friend and comforter of all clear-headed and scrupulous, yet pure-hearted and upward-striving men, in those ages most especially that walk by sight, not by faith, and yet have no open vision: he cannot give such souls, perhaps, all they yearn for, but he gives them much; and what he gives them, they can receive.

Yet no, it is not for what he thus gives them that such souls love him most! it is rather because of the emotion which lends to his voice so touching an accent, it is because he too yearns as they do for something unattained by him. What an affinity for Christianity had this persecutor of the Christians! the effusion of Christianity, its relieving tears, its happy self-sacrifice, were the very element, one feels, for which his soul longed: they were near him, they brushed him, he touched them, he passed them by. One feels, too, that the Marcus Aurelius one reads must still have remained, even had Christianity been fully known to him, in a great measure himself; he would have been no Justin: but how would Christianity have affected him? in what measure would it have changed him? Granted that he might have found, like the Alogi in ancient and modern times, in the most beautiful of the Gospels, the Gospel which has leavened Christendom most powerfully, the Gospel of St. John, too much Greek metaphysics, too 10 much gnosis; granted that this Gospel might have looked too like what he knew already to be a total surprise to him: what, then, would he have said to the Sermon on the Mount, to the twenty-sixth chapter of St. Matthew? what would have become of his notions of the exitiabilis superstitio, of the 'obstinacy of the Christians'? Vain question! yet the greatest charm of Marcus Aurelius is that he makes us ask it. We see him wise, just, self-governed, tender, thankful, blameless; yet, with all this, agitated, stretching out his arms for something beyond,—tendentemque manus 20 ripae ulterioris amore.

NOTES

PREFACE TO SECOND EDITION

(1869)

The Essays in Criticism were first published collectively in 1865, after appearing singly in various periodicals. Cf. first note to each Essay.

PAGE 3. 2. to be much criticised: notably the first essay, which was violently attacked in an article, 'Mr. Arnold and his Countrymen,' in the Saturday Review, December 3, 1864.

11. not to strive or cry: a reference to Isaiah xlii. 2.

23. Mr. Wright: Ichabod Charles Wright (1795-1871), who had translated Dante's Divina Commedia in 1845, published his translation of the first part of the Iliad in 1859. Of this Arnold had ventured to say, in the 'Lectures on Translating Homer', which he delivered at Oxford in 1861, as Professor of Poetry, that it would not 'take rank as the standard translation of Homer'. This seems to have vexed Mr. Wright, for he retorted in 'A Letter to the Dean of Canterbury [Alford, himself a translator of Homer] on the Homeric Lectures of Matthew Arnold, Esq.', which he published in the same year. The remainder of Wright's translation appeared in 1864.

PAGE 4. 7. I find that I did say: in the first lecture, p. 251, Oxford Edition of Essays, 1914.

9. Cowper's version: the Iliad and Odyssey were translated by Cowper, the poet, in 1791.

Mr. Sotheby's version: William Sotheby (1757-1833), of whom Byron said that he had 'imitated everybody and occasionally surpassed his models'. He also translated Virgil and the German Weiland.

10. Pope's version: this, the most famous of verse translations of Homer, was published 1715-20, followed by a translation of the Odyssey, 1725-6. Bentley said of the translation that it was a pretty poem, but not Homer.

In the lecture, Arnold said: 'for want of duly penetrating themselves with . . . [Homer's] rapidity, Cowper and Mr. Wright have failed in rendering him; for want of duly appreciating . . . his plainness and directness of style and diction, Pope and Mr. Sotheby have failed in rendering him. . . . Mr. Wright repeats in the main Cowper's manner, as Mr. Sotheby repeats Pope's manner.'

25. the Philistines!: in the essay on 'Heine', pp. 120-1, Arnold gives an explanation of the word, which in this sense of it he first introduced into English. Fielding, in Amelia (1752), explains the word as 'The name given by the faithful to the bailiffs'. In German, from which Arnold takes his sense of the term, the word Philistine became current at the close of the seventeenth century to distinguish townfolk (bourgeois) from students in university towns. Wiedeburg, in his Description of Jena (1785), gives this account of its origin: at the funeral of a student who had been killed in 1693 in one of the frequent street-rows between the students and townsmen, a sermon was preached from the text, Judges xvi. 9, 'The Philistines be upon thee, Samson,' and from that time onwards the word was commonly used and spread over Germany in the sense of 'citizens without University education or the culture which that is supposed to bestow'.

PAGE 5. 14. so many distinguished men: this is, of course, ironical, as the instances given show. John Henry Pepper (1821-1900) is less known as an analytical chemist and lecturer to the Royal Polytechnic than as inventor of the optical illusion celebrated as 'Pepper's Ghost', of which he wrote The True History, besides collaborating in various publications on pastimes for boys. 'Professor' Anderson, who died in 1874, was a conjuror whose skill gained him the title of 'The Wizard of the North'. 'Professor' Frickel has eluded me; he was possibly a fencing-master or a teacher of boxing.

PAGE 6. 5. Benthamism: Jeremy Bentham (1748-1832), one of the ablest champions of Utilitarianism, adopted in his Fragment on Government 'the greatest happiness of the greatest number' as the ruling principle and chief end of the legislator.

12. the murderer, Müller: an account of the murder of a Mr. Thomas Briggs, and of the consternation caused by it, will be found in The Times, July 11-14, 1864. 'The enormity of the injury inflicted on society by such an act can hardly be overstated. There is no ground for supposing that any other elderly gentleman with a gold watch-chain might not have been singled out for the same fate.'

21. a transcendentalist: by 'transcendentalism' is commonly meant 'any philosophical or religious system which emphasises the limited character of that which can be perceived by the senses; it is based on the view that true knowledge is intuitive, mystical, beyond the limits of experience.'

22. as the Saturday Review knows: 'Mr. Arnold surely cannot be ignorant of the fact that from the days of Hobbes and Locke to those of Mr. Mill and Mr. Bain, the most influential of English thinkers have utterly denied the truth of transcendentalism and have constantly affirmed that all knowledge is based upon experience and sensation.'—The Saturday Review, December 3, 1864.

26. how Caesar refused: when his friends Hirtius and Pansa remonstrated with him on his dismissal of his guard, in 43 B. C., he answered that it was better to die once than to be always in fear of death. Velleius, ii. 57.

32. il n'y a pas, &c.: 'no one is indispensable.'

PAGE 7. 16. Exeter Hall: erected in 1830, in the Strand, a short distance westward of the Lyceum Theatre; it was used for religious, charitable, and musical assemblies, and, notably, for the Protestant May meetings, which were held annually till 1880. It has since been demolished.

31. 'There are our young barbarians': adapted from Byron's Childe Harold, Canto iv. 141 (of the statue of the Dying Gladiator in the museum of the Capitol at Rome).

There were his young barbarians all at play,
There was their Dacian mother: he, their sire,
Butchered to make a Roman holiday.

PAGE 8. 4. beauty . . . which is only truth: an allusion, probably, to Keats's 'Ode on a Grecian Urn', last stanza,

Beauty is Truth, Truth Beauty—that is all
Ye know on earth and all ye need to know.

6. Tübingen: the German University in Württemberg, founded in 1477, and famous during the nineteenth century for its Faculty of Protestant Theology, which, with Strauss as its leading exponent, developed some very destructive tendencies.

17. the bondage of 'was uns alle bündigt': 'what binds us all, the commonplace,' quoted from Goethe's Epilog zu Schillers Glocke, written for the Schiller Memorial Festival at Lauchstädt, August 10, 1805.

Und hinter ihm in wesenlosem Scheine
Lag was uns alle bündigt, das Gemeine.

By 'das Gemeine' Goethe means not so much 'common' as 'commonplace'; Schiller, in Wallenstein, speaks of the 'ganz gemein, ewig gestrig', meaning 'the altogether commonplace, the everlasting yesterday's'.

21. Apparitions: Arnold's use of this word is curious. Etymologically the word connotes 'appearance' simply, but now it is almost restricted to the sense of 'phantom', 'ghost', 'a deceptive appearance'. The word has always had the suggestion of an 'appearance before the world', 'startling, unexpected, or supernatural'; hence later the implication of unreality—which is not excluded in this passage. In the Function of Criticism, pp. 20, 24, where Arnold speaks of an 'apparition of intellectual life', it is the idea of sudden and startling manifestation that is emphasized.

THE FUNCTION OF CRITICISM AT THE PRESENT TIME

This essay appeared in the National Review (November, 1864) and immediately called forth a 'long elaborate attack of nearly four columns' by FitzJames Stephen in the Saturday Review.

PAGE 9. 1. Many objections have been made: the three lectures 'On Translating Homer', given at Oxford in 1861, when Arnold held the Professorship of Poetry, called forth severe criticism, notably in the Saturday Review. Writing to Mrs. Forster (July 31, 1861) Arnold says: 'You will have seen the amenities of the Saturday Review. It seems affected to say one does not care for such things, but I do really feel that my spirits rebound after them sooner than most people's.'

3. a proposition about criticism: from the conclusion of the second lecture 'On Translating Homer'.

10. certain causes: 'owing to the presence in English literature of this eccentric and arbitrary spirit, owing to the strong tendency of English writers to bring to the consideration of their subject some individual fancy,' ibid.

19. an excellent notice of Wordsworth in the North British Review: this appeared in August 1864. John Campbell Shairp, the writer, was Professor of Poetry at Oxford, 1877-87.

PAGE 10. 1. in one of his letters: to Bernard Barton, from Rydal Mount, January 12, 1816. The quotation is from Memoirs of William Wordsworth, by Christopher Wordsworth, 1851, vol. ii, p. 53.

10. 'Wordsworth holds the critical power': ibid., vol. ii, p. 439. This conversation took place with his nephew in November 1843. How low Wordsworth held the critical power may be judged from expressions in his letters; e.g. he writes of the Critical Review to Francis Wrangham (July 12, 1807): 'there is a most malignant spirit (his fleshly name is Leatrice) whose gall and venom are discharged upon the public through that Review.' In November 1807 he describes a review of his poems as 'a miserable heap of spiteful nonsense, even worse than anything that has happened hitherto in these disgraceful days', and another as 'a splenetic effusion of the conductor of the Review, who has taken up a perpetual retainer from his own incapacity to plead against my claims to public approbation'.

36. Irene: Johnson's only drama—a tragedy in five acts, and in blank verse. It was produced by Garrick at Drury Lane Theatre in 1749, and ran for nine nights. Three acts of it had been written thirteen years earlier, before Johnson came to London. The Lives of the Poets were originally written as prefaces to a new edition of the English poets from Cowley onwards.

38. his Ecclesiastical Sonnets: these appeared in 1822, but Wordsworth constantly added to them. They deal specially with the history of the Church of England from the earliest times, and illustrate Wordsworth's recoil from revolutionary principles to the settled order of a constitutional government and the national established Church. Though the Sonnets maintain a fairly high level throughout, they lack the strong creative impulse of true artistic work, and in some cases are little more than verses to order on given historical themes.

39. his celebrated Preface: i.e. the Preface to Lyrical Ballads, second edition (1800), in which Wordsworth put forth his conception of the principles of poetry and of his choice of diction: these were, to choose incidents and situations from common life and to relate or describe them, throughout, as far as possible in a selection of language really used by men, and at the same time to throw over them a certain colouring of imagination whereby ordinary things should be presented to the mind in an unusual aspect.

40. Wordsworth was himself a great critic: besides the Preface there are two other papers of criticism in the same volume; see also the letter to Lady Beaumont (1807), letter to The Friend (December 14, 1809, and January 4, 1810), and the Preface to Poems (1815).

PAGE 11. 1. Goethe was one of the greatest of critics: in a general sense the whole six-and-thirty volumes of his work, with all the Letters and Conversations added, are a record of Goethe's criticism, but, more particularly, Wilhelm Meister, the Sprüche in Prosa, Dichtung und Wahrheit, the collected papers on German and other literature and the Conversations with Eckermann contain the sum of his critical teaching. Goethe's exhortation Im Ganzen, Guten, Schönen resolut zu leben ('to live with steady purpose in the Whole, the Good, the Beautiful') is the principle on which all his critical work is based; that is to say, it proceeds not from caprice, nor from personal proclivity or particular taste, but from a steady comprehension of the whole.

PAGE 13. 25. Shelley so incoherent: elsewhere (Essays in Criticism, second series) Arnold describes Shelley as 'a beautiful but ineffectual angel, beating luminous wings in the void'. Shelley's twofold interest in science and metaphysics, with his love of Rosicrucianism and magic of all kinds, often led him to express vaguely the material in terms of the immaterial.

27. Wordsworth cared little for books: in a letter to his brother, written April 27, 1830, he writes: 'The more I reflect upon the subject, the more I am convinced that positive instruction, even of a religious character, is much over-rated. There is an officious disposition on the part of the upper and middle classes to precipitate the tendency of the people towards culture in a manner subversive of their own happiness and dangerous to the peace of society.'

and disparaged Goethe: Lady Richardson, in her Reminiscences (quoted in Christopher Wordsworth's Life), remarks: 'Wordsworth made some striking remarks on Goethe in a walk on the terrace yesterday [August 25, 1841]. He thinks that the German poet is greatly overrated both in this country and in his own. He said: "I consider him a very artificial writer, aiming to be universal and yet constantly exposing his individuality, which his character was not of a kind to dignify. He had not sufficiently clear moral perceptions to make him anything but an artificial writer."' Similarly his nephew quotes Wordsworth as saying, 'I have tried to read Goethe. I never could succeed. There is a profligacy, an inhuman sensuality in his works which is utterly revolting. I am not intimately acquainted with them generally,' ibid., p. 478.

39. Shelley had plenty of reading: in a note on the Early Poems of 1814 and 1815 Mrs. Shelley writes: 'In the scanty journals kept during those years I find a record of the books that Shelley read during several years. It includes, in Greek, Homer, Hesiod, Theocritus, the histories of Thucydides and Herodotus, and Diogenes Laertius. In Latin, Petronius, Suetonius, some of the works of Cicero, a large proportion of those of Seneca and Livy. In English, Milton's Poems, Wordsworth's Excursion, Southey's Madoc and Thalaba, Locke On the Human Understanding, Bacon's Novum Organum. In Italian, Ariosto, Tasso, and Alfieri. In French, the Réveries d'un Solitaire of Rousseau. To these may be added several modern books of travels. He read few novels.'

Coleridge had immense reading: before his fifteenth year he translated the eight hymns of Synesius from the Greek into English Anacreontics. He said to his friend Thelwall: 'I am and ever have been a great reader and have read almost everything, a library cormorant. I am deep in all out of the way books, whether of the monkish times or the puritanical era. Metaphysics and poetry and "facts of mind" are my darling studies.'

41. Pindar and Sophocles . . . had not many books: Pindar (c. 518-446 B.C.), the great lyric poet of Greece, is known to us by the Epinicia, forty-four odes written for the rich and noble victors in the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games.

Sophocles (495-406 B.C.): the second of the three great tragedians of Greece, Aeschylus and Euripides being the other two. Seven of his plays are extant. Books (codices), in the strict sense of the word, came into use at Rome in Martial's time (c. A.D. 38-102), but examples of papyrus rolls (volumina) have survived from the latter part of the fourth century B.C. Homer and Hesiod, as well as the lyric, didactic, and gnomic poets, would certainly be familiar both to Pindar and to Sophocles.

PAGE 14. 2. Shakspeare was no deep reader: it is certain, however, that Julius Caesar, Coriolanus, and Antony and Cleopatra are founded on North's translation of Plutarch, and the Comedy of Errors on the Menaechmi of Plautus; the Two Gentlemen of Verona shows acquaintance with the Diana of the Portuguese-Spaniard Montemayor, and other plays reproduce situations in the Novelle of the Italian writers Cinthio and Bandello. Shakspeare knew also Florio's translation of the Essays of Montaigne, and made copious use of Hollinshed's Chronicles in the English historical plays.

22. the long and widely-combined critical effort of Germany: there is no political or social explanation of the sudden growth of the new German literature which sprang up after the Seven Years' War (1756-63), under the shelter of France and of England in an age which knew no national boundaries.

The critical philosophy of Kant, the beginnings of biblical criticism, the imitation and assimilation by Herder and Lessing of all that was great in ancient and modern literature, the classical revival under the influence of Winckelmann, who, in the words of Hegel, 'opened a new sense for the study of art and initiated a new organ for the human spirit'—all this, supplemented by the 'return to nature' preached by Rousseau and the 'Enlightenment' of the French Encyclopaedists, was in the air when Goethe was born, in 1749.

24. the Athens of Pericles: the beginning of the ascendancy of Pericles (490-429 B. C.) marked an unprecedented outward expansion of Athenian power. Something akin to critical effort there was already then at Athens, in the rationalism of Anaxagoras and Zeno, and the humanism of Protagoras and Menon, just as the expansion of England under Elizabeth heralded the inductive philosophy of Bacon and the political philosophy of Hobbes.

PAGE 15. 10. the France of Voltaire and Rousseau: they both died in 1778.

35. the old woman who threw her stool: on Sunday, July 23, 1637, when Laud's Liturgy was introduced in St. Giles's Church, 'there arose such an uncouth noise and hubbub in the Church that not anyone could either hear or be heard. The gentlewomen did fall a-tearing and crying out that the Masse was entered among them and Baal in the temple. There was a gentleman who standing behind a pew and answering Amen to what the Dean was reading, a she zealot, hearing him, starts up in choler, "Traitor," says she, "dost thou say Mass at my ear", and with that struck him on the face with her Bible in great indignation and fury.' This is the origin of the story of Jenny Geddes throwing her stool, to which Arnold alludes here. Cf. Burton, History of Scotland, vol. vi.

PAGE 16. 4. a decimal coinage is an absurdity: the decimal system has been opposed, however, not only by British merchants and manufacturers, but by Herbert Spencer, who wrote a tract against it and left a sum of money for reprinting and disseminating the tract, if there should be any possibility of the decimal system being adopted in this country.

PAGE 17. 3. Joubert has said beautifully: quoted from Raynal's edition of the Pensées et Maximes of Joubert, Paris, 1850, vol. i, p. 355. The seventh essay of this volume is devoted to Joubert, pp. 163 et seq.

30. Burke: Reflections on the Revolution in France appeared in 1790. This famous essay did much to arouse fear and hatred of the political principles of the Revolution and caused an irreparable breach between Burke and Fox; it was followed in 1796 by the equally famous Letters on a Regicide Peace.

PAGE 18. 11. Dr. Price: an Arian or Unitarian Nonconformist minister and writer on morals (1723-91). An ardent lover of civil and religious liberty, he published in 1776 a pamphlet, Observations on Civil Liberty and the Justice and Policy of the War with America. In his famous sermon On the Love of our Country, preached November 4, 1789—"the red rag that drew Burke into the arena"—Price observed: "I could almost say, "Lord now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation." After sharing in the benefits of one revolution, I have been spared to be a witness to two other revolutions, both glorious.' This statement Burke took to be an allusion to the execution of the Queen and the French nobility on October 6; Price affirmed, however, in his Preface to the fourth edition of the sermon that this was not so, but that he had in mind the taking of the Bastille on July 14.

17. he to party gave up: quoted from Goldsmith's 'Retaliation', line 32:

[Burke] born for the Universe, narrowed his mind,
And to party gave up what was meant for mankind.

23. some of the last pages: this is untrue. Burke died in 1797. The Letter to a Noble Lord and the three Letters on a Regicide Peace were written in 1796.

PAGE 19. 8. like Balaam: see Num. xxii. 38.

14. Lord Auckland: William Eden (1744-1814), statesman and diplomatist. He entered the House of Commons as member for Woodstock in 1774, negotiated the commercial treaty with France in 1786, and the agreement settling disputes between the French and English East India Companies. He was raised to the peerage in 1789. I have not traced his 'memorandum'.

19. a political animal: whoever applied this term to the Englishman was only plagiarizing from Aristotle, who terms man πολιτικὸν ζῷον, Pol. i. 2. 9.

28. a free play of the mind: the constant repetition of this phrase throughout this and the next paragraphs is a good instance of one remarkable feature of Arnold's style, laborious emphasis by the repetition of whole phrases word for word, often in the same sentence. Other instances are 'as may suit its being that' in his enumeration of existing Reviews (p. 21) and 'the British College of Health in the New Road' (p. 30). This last instance illustrates Arnold's use of this device as a weapon of satire and controversy; he repeats the phrase again and again 'till the reader wants to rush out and burn the place down'.

PAGE 20. 16. The traveller in the fable: the story of the contest between the North Wind and the Sun as to which of them would first strip a man of his clothes, with the moral that Persuasion is better than Force, appears in the Fabulae Aesopicae. Aesop lived c. 620 B. C.; some of his fables are as old as Hesiod, others only date from mediaeval times.

24. apparition: see note to p. 8, 21.

PAGE 21. 7. disinterestedness: this dictum is taken from Arnold's master in criticism, Sainte-Beuve, who writes in his essay on Mademoiselle de l'Espinasse, 'Criticism should be without partiality and without bias. It weds itself to persons only for a time and passes from one group to another without binding itself permanently to any of them. To have rendered justice to one writer is for criticism no argument for refusing it to his opponent.'

35. Revue des Deux Mondes: this Review was established in 1829. In 1831, under François Buloz, it became known as the 'vestibule of the Academy'. Aristocratic tendencies, however, hindered this 'free play of the mind', and to Arnold's contemporaries in France the Revue was known as the organ of 'dukes, dunces, and dévotés'.

39. the Edinburgh Review: this was started in 1802 by Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, Horner, and Brougham. Amongst its most distinguished contributors have been Hazlitt, Carlyle, and Macaulay.

41. the Quarterly Review: in 1809, Scott, dissatisfied with the Edinburgh Review, persuaded John Murray, his London publisher, to begin the Quarterly. Canning, Scott, Southey, Kinglake, Gladstone, and Lord Salisbury have been amongst the contributors.

PAGE 22. 2. the British Quarterly Review: this was founded in 1845 and succeeded the British and Foreign Review, which ran from 1835 to 1844.

15. the Home and Foreign Review: this Review first appeared in July 1862, with Acton as its first editor. The Review ceased in 1864; during its short run the 'Notices of Books', midway between the 'grand manner' of the Quarterly and the common-places of the Saturday Review, attracted considerable attention at home and abroad.

18. the Dublin Review: in 1835 Cardinal Wiseman was approached by Daniel O'Connell and asked to join in the foundation of a Catholic Review which should continue the work of his Lectures and depict the Genius of Christianity in its Catholic form. The first number appeared in May 1836.

PAGE 23. 4. Mr. Adderley: Charles Bowyer Adderley, 1st Baron Norton, statesman, was the pioneer of town-planning at Saltley, near Birmingham, and Tory Member of Parliament for Northern Staffordshire, 1841-78.

11. Mr. Roebuck: the Right Hon. J. A. Roebuck, barrister and politician, was member for Bath (1832-37) and for Sheffield (1849-68 and 1874-9). He was an original member of the Reform Club and a vigorous 'independent' pamphleteer. The words quoted by Arnold are most probably from one of his speeches at the annual Sheffield Cutlers' Feasts.

22. 'Das wenige verschwindet', &c.: Goethe, Iphigenie auf Tauris, Act I, Scene 2.

The little done must vanish from his eye,
Who looking forward sees the much undone.

—Trans. Dowden.

This recalls Lucan, Pharsalia, ii. 657 :

Nil actum credens, dum quid superesset agendum.

36. church-rates: a rate upon the assessed property in a parish, levied by the vestry for the maintenance of the church. It was abolished by Mr. Gladstone's Act in 1868.

a six-pound franchise: when this was written the franchise was enjoyed only by persons qualified under the Reform Act of 1832, which limited it in boroughs to occupants of premises worth £10 a year. From 1854 onwards several abortive attempts were made to lower this qualification, and in February 1867 a bill was introduced to substitute a £6 franchise. This was, however, withdrawn in favour of a wider bill passed the following July, which gave the franchise to all householders, as well as to lodgers occupying premises of the annual value of £10.

PAGE 24. 5. dithyramb: originally, in ancient Greece, a round choric dance and song in honour of the wine-god Dionysus, introduced into Athens from Naxos; the word 'dithyramb' is now used for any enthusiastic utterance in lyric language, such as Dryden's poem, 'Alexander's Feast', and hence for any exaggerated expression of enthusiastic praise.

19. A shocking child murder: an account of the trial of Elizabeth Wragg appeared in the Times of March 1, 1865.

22. the Mapperley Hills: Mapperley is a northern suburb of Nottingham.

36. by the Ilissus: the Ilissus, the famous river of Attica, flows south and east of Athens.

PAGE 25. 24. the Indian virtue of detachment: an allusion to the Buddhist practice of intense self-absorption and mystic meditation, in order to attain to emancipation from all desire.

PAGE 26. 25. shade of Lord Somers: John Baron Somers (1651-1716), Lord Chancellor of England, presided over the drafting of the Declaration of Rights and asserted the virtual abdication of James II in 1689.

26. Cobbett: William Cobbett (1762-1835), essayist, politician, and agriculturist. He began his career as a Tory journalist (1801), but afterwards he adopted popular opinions and wrote in the Radical interest in Cobbett's Weekly Political Register, which he began to publish in 1802 and continued up to his death.

29. Mr. Carlyle . . . Mr. Ruskin: with the completion of Modern Painters Ruskin (1819-1900) entered upon a new period of literary activity, and under the influence of Carlyle, whose Latter Day Pamphlets appeared in eight numbers in 1850, denouncing the moral and intellectual tendencies of contemporary democracy, he began to preach a form of aristocratic socialism against the existing political economy of John Stuart Mill and his school. Unto This Last appeared in 1862, followed by Munera Pulveris (1862-3). Carlyle's attack was directed against machinery in all departments of thought and life; Ruskin's 'fierce lightning bolts' were aimed at the brutalizing effects of work without art and the doctrine that the production and accumulation of wealth is valuable apart from the right use of it in developing a complete human life.

PAGE 27. 7. terrae filii: a not uncommon Latin expression for a 'nobody': cf. Persius, Sat. vi. 57:

Quaere ex me quis mihi quartus

Sit pater: haud prompte, dicam tamen, adde etiam unum,

Unum etiam: terrae est iam filius, . . .

'Ask me who my great-great-grandfather was; give me time and I will tell you. Go back one step more and one step more—he is a groundling.' See too Cic. Att. i. 13 and Petronius 43.

26. To act is so easy, . . . to think is so hard: and, Goethe adds, 'to act according to our thought is so troublesome'.

32. Obermann: Étienne Pivert de Senancour (1770-1846), French author. A series of letters, inspired by Rousseau and supposed to be written by a melancholy and solitary person in a lonely valley of the Jura, was published at Paris in 1804 with the title Obermann. This work inspired two poems of Arnold; 'Stanzas in Memory of the Author of Obermann' (1852), and 'Obermann Once More' (1867).

Périssons en résistant: 'let us perish resisting.' Obermann, Supplement, Letter 90.

35. Bishop Colenso: in 1861 his commentary on St. Paul, 'bristling with heresies' and striking at the root of the sacramental principle, first brought Colenso, Bishop of Natal, into prominence. In 1862 the first three volumes of his critical examination of the Pentateuch appeared, with the result that Colenso was 'deposed' by Dr. Gray, Bishop of Capetown, but the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council pronounced the whole proceedings null and void. The Pentateuch was finished in 1879: Colenso died in 1883. His main critical conclusions were two: that a large amount of the matter contained in the Pentateuch was unhistorical, and that much of the legislation attributed to Moses belonged to a date many centuries later.

In January, 1863, Arnold had published a vigorous attack on Colenso's first volume in Macmillan's Magazine, with the title 'The Bishop and the Philosopher', see below, p. 301, note to Essay on 'Spinoza and the Bible'.

PAGE 28. 12. Joubert: 'L'ignorance, qui, en morale, atténue la faute, est, elle-même, en littérature, une faute capitale.'—Œuvres, ed. Raynal, 1888, vol. ii, p. 311.

20. Dr. Stanley: Arthur Penrhyn Stanley (1815-81), Dean of Westminster. He was a supporter of Colenso and of Jowett, and defended Essays and Reviews in the Edinburgh Review. His Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, published in 1863-5, were favourably reviewed by Arnold in Macmillan's Magazine:

27. the Church and State Review: the first number was published on June 1, 1862, with Archdeacon Denison as editor. Its programme was the spread of 'pure Catholicism' in the National Church.

28. the Record: a Low Church weekly newspaper, first published in 1828.

30. the eighty and odd pigeons: see Colenso on Lev. x. 16, 20. 'The very pigeons to be brought as sin-offerings for the birth of children would have averaged according to the story more than 250 a day; and each Priest would have had to eat daily more than eighty for his own portion "in the most holy place"!'. Most of Colenso's book is devoted to nice calculations of this kind in biblical arithmetic, which, Arnold says, was his 'favourite science'.

PAGE 29. 4. a lady: Frances Power Cobbe (1822-1904), philanthropist and religious writer. She was an ardent anti-vivisectionist, an advocate of degrees for women and the extension of the parliamentary franchise to them, and occasionally conducted services in Unitarian chapels.

8. M. Renan's survey: the Vie de Jésus of Renan (1823-92), a production more sentimental than scholarly, appeared in 1863, the first of a series of eight volumes entitled Histoire des Origines du Christianisme.

9. in her survey of the religious state of Europe: i.e. in Broken Lights, a volume, published in 1864, on the future prospects of religious faith.

22. Dr. Strauss's book: the Leben Jesu of David Friedrich Strauss was first published in 1835, and is based on the theory that, apart from a very slender outline of personal history, the Christ of the gospels is the unintentional creation of early Christian Messianic expectation.

the book of Bishop Colenso: in his review of it in Macmillan's Magazine, Arnold spoke of Colenso's work as eliciting 'a titter from educated Europe'. The eminent Dutch theologian and Old Testament critic, Kuenen, on the other hand, spoke of it as 'simply annihilating', and was considerably influenced by it in his own work.

33. Fleury's sentence: Claude Fleury (1640-1723), ecclesiastical historian, published his Histoire Ecclésiastique at Paris, in twenty tomes, in 1691. In the preface Fleury explains that he has not begun with the life of Our Lord because it can best be studied in the 'continual reading of the Gospels, and whosoever imagines that he could write it better, does not understand it'.

PAGE 30. 4. Cicero's maxim: Letters to Atticus, xvi. 7. 3.

9. Coleridge's happy phrase: in Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit, Letter I, 'On the Inspiration of the Scriptures'.

13. in Voltaire's fashion: cf. Joubert (op. cit. ii. 365), 'Voltaire would have read patiently through thirty or forty folio volumes to find one small religious joke. That was his passion, his ambition, his mania.'

28. her recent Religious Duty: this work was published in 1864, and deals successively with Religious Duty, Religious Offences, Religious Faults, and Religious Obligations, in a spirit of eclectic Arianism.

34. the British College of Health: this was founded in 1828 by James Morison (1770-1840), self-styled the 'Hygeist', vendor of Morison's Pills. After thirty-five years' 'inexpressible suffering' he accomplished his own extraordinary cure about 1822 by the simple expedient of swallowing at bedtime a few vegetable pills of his own compounding and a glass of lemonade in the morning. There is frequent scornful reference to 'Morison's Pill' in Carlyle's Past and Present.

37. the Goddess Hygeia: in classical mythology the goddess of health was the daughter of Aesculapius. She is represented as a virgin with a snake, the symbol of health, drinking from a cup held in her hand.

PAGE 32. 2. the English Divorce Court: the court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes was established by the Divorce Law of 1857. Previously to that, divorce a mensa et toro had been under the control of the ecclesiastical courts and the House of Lords.

20. Luther's theory of grace: Luther preached the doctrine of salvation by faith, in opposition to the orthodox doctrine of salvation by good works. On this latter the doctrine of indulgences was based, the theory being that works of supererogation, i.e., those which were in excess of what was needed for a man's personal salvation, might be credited, by the intervention of the Church, to sinners whose account was less satisfactory. Luther, combating this doctrine, declared that a man's faith was the only thing that could save him.

21. Bossuet's philosophy of history: Jacques Bénigne Bossuet (1627-1704), bishop of Meaux, wrote his Discours sur l'Histoire universelle when he was tutor to the only son of Louis XIV. The Discours is an able argument for authority in all its forms: 'le roi, Jésus-Christ, l'Église, Dieu en ces trois noms,' as he says in a letter. With its insistence on history as an evolutionary process the Discours may claim to be one of the first philosophical histories.

23. the Bishop of Durham: Charles Thomas Baring (1807-79), a 'strong evangelical'.

Pope Pius the Ninth: Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti (1722-1878), who became Pope in 1846. He promulgated the Dogma of the Immaculate Conception in 1854; in 1864 he put forth his Syllabus complectens praecipuos nostrae aetatis errores, in which he claimed control of all culture and science, and affirmed that 'the pontiff neither can be nor ought to be reconciled with progress, liberalism, and modern civilisation'.

PAGE 33. 20. Ab integro saeculorum: 'the [great] cycle of periods is born anew.' Virgil, Eclogue iv. 5, written during the consulship of Pollio, from whom the Éclogue is named.

PAGE 36. 10. the epoch of Aeschylus: Aeschylus (525-456 B. C.), the contemporary of Pindar, lived in the 'spacious days' that followed upon the failure of the Persian Empire under Darius and Xerxes to enslave Greece (490-480 B. C.). Similarly, in England, the defeat of the Spanish Armada (1588) and the expansion of English colonial enterprise ushered in the greatest period of English literature.

THE LITERARY INFLUENCE OF ACADEMIES

This essay appeared in the Cornhill Magazine for August 1864.

PAGE 37. 1. the history of the French Academy. Histoire de l'Académie Française par Pellisson et d'Olivet, avec une introduction, des éclaircissements et notes par M. Ch.-L. Livet. Paris, 1858. The work of Pellisson, forming a complete history of the Academy and its members up to his time, appeared in 1652 and was continued, with remarks and additions, by the Abbé d'Olivet in 1729. Arnold's account of the Academy is taken from its first chapters.

9. words of Lord Macaulay: from a minute of Lord Macaulay, then a member of the supreme Council of India, dated February 2, 1835, and printed by Mr. Trevelyan (afterwards Sir George Otto Trevelyan) in chapter xii of The Competition Wallah (1864). There is a similar remark in the Essay on Bacon (1837), near the beginning.

16. Spinoza's maxim: for Spinoza cf. essay on 'Spinoza and the Bible'. I cannot trace the reference.

26. Cardinal Richelieu: Armand Jean du Plessis, Cardinal Richelieu (1585-1642), the celebrated minister of Louis XIII. He was himself the author of two or three plays of no merit, two theological treatises, and Mémoires of his own times.

PAGE 38. 30. Its statutes of foundation: these are reprinted in Livet's book from the text put forth in 1708. The statute in question is the twenty-fourth.

PAGE 39. 22. The celebrated opinion on Corneille's Cid. Pierre Corneille (1606–84), the greatest of French tragedians, produced Le Cid, his best-known, if not his greatest, play in 1636. It was attacked by Georges de Scudéry, himself a playwright, in a letter to the Academy, and at Richelieu's request that body chose three commissioners to examine the play. Their report, which was a qualified condemnation—far too qualified in Richelieu's opinion—so disgusted Corneille that he produced no more plays for three years.

28. One who had known: Hippolyte Jules de la Mesnardière (died 1663), doctor of medicine to Gaston duc d'Orléans. The statement in the text (the truth of which may be doubted) is from his discourse at his reception into the Academy.

31. a Prytaneum: a public building in Greek cities consecrated to Hestia or Vesta. At Athens foreign Ambassadors and citizens who had deserved well of the commonwealth were entertained in the Prytaneum as public guests.

PAGE 40. 4. M. Sainte-Beuve: Charles Augustin Sainte-Beuve (1804–69), the most famous of modern French critics, was elected to the Academy in 1844 and in 1854 became Professor of Poetry in the Collège de France and Maitre de Conférences (lecturer) on French literature at the École Normale Supérieure. But the critical work by which he is best known (Causeries du Lundi and Nouveaux Lundis) consists of short essays contributed weekly to periodicals. The references to Sainte-Beuve in this essay are from his review of Livet's History of the French Academy in Causeries du Lundi, tome xiv.

10. M. Renan: see note to p. 29, 8. The quotations are from the essay 'L'Académie Française' in Essais de Morale et de Critique, 1859.

30. says Goethe: see note to p. 8, 17, where the same verse is quoted.

37. Out of the four great parts: the reference is to the De Officiis, i. 4 and 5, where the four constituent elements into which the honestum may be resolved are said to be: 1. Sapientia. 2. Iustitia et Beneficentia. 3. Fortitudo. 4. Temperantia. It is to this fourth class that the discovery of 'order' and 'good taste' belongs.

PAGE 41. 23. Those are very remarkable words: contrast, however, with them these words from a letter of Sainte-Beuve to a friend: 'All these academies, between you and me, are pieces of childishness; at any rate the French Academy is. Our least quarter of an hour of solitary reverie or of serious talk, yours and mine, in our youth, was better employed; but as one gets old, one falls back into the power of these nothings; only it is well to know what nothings they are.'

PAGE 43. 11. Newton: Sir Isaac Newton (1642-1727), the greatest of English mathematicians and natural philosophers. The first book of his Principia was presented to the Royal Society in 1685, and the entire work published in the following year. The reformation of the English coinage was largely his work as master of the Mint (1697). Newton became President of the Royal Society in 1703.

18. an authority, like an academy: the view put forward here by Arnold is very arbitrary. There is no more ground for supposing 'quick and flexible intelligence' to be the peculiar property of the French people or of the Latin temperament than for supposing 'energy' in literary creation to be characteristic exclusively of English writers and the Teutonic temperament. In the early seventeenth century, when the chief literary danger in France was a neglect of measures and of models, it was no doubt a restraining and guiding influence that was necessary; but the Academy became in time a check and hindrance to spontaneous creative work, and latterly it has lost its claim to being a 'legislative tribunal' or 'sovereign organ of opinion'.

PAGE 44. 30. The power of French literature: the only foundation for this jugement saugrenu (cf. p. 170, 16) is that Arnold preferred French prose to French verse and English verse to English prose, and sought to find justification by searching for faulty specimens of what he disliked in both literatures—no very difficult task; cf. p. 132, 34.

PAGE 45. 2. Shakspeare and our great Elizabethan group: Marlowe (1564-93), Ben Jonson (1572-1637), Beaumont (1585-1616), Fletcher (1579-1625), Massinger (1583-1640); and others.

3. Corneille and his group: this group may be taken to include Racine (1639-99), Corneille's younger brother, Thomas Corneille (1625-1709), Molière (1622-73), the greatest of French comic dramatists, and his pupil Regnard (1656-1710).

7. our provincial and second-rate literature: it is difficult to understand on what principles of criticism this sweeping verdict, embracing the work of Pope, Swift, Berkeley, Smollett, Fielding, Richardson, Sterne, Hume, Gibbon, and Burke, can be based.

13. the most powerful and pervasive intellectual agencies that have ever existed: this educational quality is not necessarily a mark of literary excellence, though Arnold with his schoolmaster's mind seems to think so. Of the two greatest names in eighteenth century French literature, Voltaire and Rousseau, Voltaire, when he was not, as in his poetry, a careful imitator of academic classicism, drew most of his philosophic inspiration from English sources, and Rousseau's work and life was one long protest against sovereign organs of opinion, in politics, religion, and literature, so that the whole romantic movement derives directly from him.

19. Leibnitz: Gottfried Wilhelm Leibnitz (1646-1717), German idealistic philosopher, mathematician, historian, politician, and divine, possessed the most all-round mind of his time. In mathematics he is celebrated as one of the discoverers of the differential calculus, in philosophy for his theory of reality as being made up of an infinite host of individual beings or monads, of which those lower in the scale are what we call matter, those more highly developed are souls, while highest of all are self-conscious minds, or spirits.

28. the English analysts: amongst them were Priestley (1733-1804) who discovered oxygen, and Joseph Black (1728-99) who discovered carbonic acid gas and latent heat. Far more important than the analysts among Newton's successors were the English astronomers of the eighteenth century: Bradley (1692-1762) who discovered the aberration of light, Herschel (1738-1822), and Dollond the optician (1706-61).

31. successors like Bernouilli: this family, the most famous in the annals of science, came originally from Antwerp, whence they were driven by persecution to Frankfurt (1583), afterwards settling at Basle. Jacques Bernouilli (1654-1705) and his brother Jean (1667-1748) were enthusiastic pupils of Leibnitz, at whose request they were received into the Academy of Berlin. Jacques was the first to solve Leibnitz's problem of the isochronous curve, Jean discovered the exponential calculus and the line of swiftest descent. Nicolas Bernouilli (1695-1726), eleventh of Jacques Bernouilli's sons; his brother Daniel (1700-82), professor of mathematics at St. Petersburg and of experimental and speculative philosophy at Basle; Jean Bernouilli (1710-90), son of Jean Bernouilli mentioned above, professor of mathematics at Padua; his son Nicolas Bernouilli (1744-80), at the age of eighteen astronomer royal of Berlin; and Jacques Bernouilli (1759-89), younger brother of the preceding—all these carried on the work of Leibnitz in mathematics and science.

Euler: Leonhard Euler (1707-83), Swiss mathematician, carried the integral calculus to the highest degree of perfection and invented the calculation of sines. In 1727, at the invitation of Catherine I, he moved to St. Petersburg, and in 1741 Frederick the Great brought him to Berlin, where he held the post of professor of mathematics; his works fill from sixty to eighty volumes quarto.

Lagrange: Joseph Louis Lagrange (1736-1813), French mathematician trained at Turin, discoverer of the calculus of variations, succeeded Euler at Berlin.

Laplace: Pierre Simon Marquis de Laplace (1749-1827), astronomer and mathematician, the Newton of France. Among his most noted researches are those on the inequality of the motions of Jupiter and Saturn, on lunar motions, on probabilities, and on the tides. His Mécanique céleste is his most famous work.

It is incorrect to contrast these foreign mathematicians with the English successors of Newton; they were mathematicians, and as such were deeply indebted to Newton whose doctrine Voltaire introduced to the Continent; their English contemporaries were hardly less distinguished in astronomy and chemistry.

PAGE 47. 9. Mr. Bohn's library: Henry George Bohn (1796-1884) published over 600 volumes in various collections, which are still in general use.

10. M. Nisard's collection: Jean Désiré Nisard (1806-88), author of Histoire de la Littérature Française (1844-61), for which he was received into the Academy. His Collection des Auteurs Latins, in Latin and French, was published in twenty-seven volumes, 1850-3.

33. the word 'diocese': 'Diocess' was the classical English form of the word from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century, and is the only form recognized by Johnson and the eighteenth century lexicographers. The word is derived through Latin from the Greek διοίκησις = housekeeping, a governor's jurisdiction, and hence, specially a bishop's jurisdiction. Under Latin influence at the Renaissance the form in English and in French became 'dioces', and hence, for phonetic reasons, 'diocessè' or 'diocess', and diocèse respectively.

35. The Journal des Débats: this newspaper, founded in 1786, became, under the Bertins, a leading critical journal.

PAGE 48. 10. The late Mr. Donaldson: John William Donaldson (1811-61), philologist, fellow and tutor of Trinity College, Cambridge, author of the New Cratylus, which practically started the science of philology in England, and Varronianus, in which he put forward an advanced theory of Gothic affinities of the Etruscans. He also edited Pindar and Sophocles, and in 1854 published at Berlin a Latin work on the Book of Jashar, or Jasher, mentioned in Joshua x. 13, and in 2 Samuel i. 18. Donaldson tried to reconstitute this work from the fragments which he believed to be incorporated in the text of the Old Testament, but his attempt has been generally condemned as a very clever piece of rash speculation.

14. M. Renan calls it: in Études d'Histoire Religieuse: L'Histoire du peuple d'Israël, Paris, 1858. Renan again alludes to this work of Donaldson in his Histoire des Langues Sémitiques as 'un jeu tout artificiel'.

33. Washington Irving's Life of Mahomet: the Lives of Mahomet and his Successors, by Washington Irving, New York, 1850. This criticism by Renan is from the Études quoted above, 'Mahomet et les Origines de l'Islamisme'.

36. Mr. Charles Forster: the Reverend Charles Forster, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, rector of Stisted in Essex, published, besides other works, Mahometanism unveiled: an inquiry in which that arch-heresy, its diffusion and continuance, are examined on a new principle tending to confirm the evidences . . . of the Christian Faith, 2 vols, London, 1829; and The One Primeval Language, 1851.

PAGE 49. 2. the little horn of the he-goat: the horns of the he-goat are explained usually to be the kingdoms of Media and Persia.

10. the Sinaitic inscriptions: in the Wady Mokatteb, or 'Written Valley', in the south of the Sinai Peninsula, the rocks are covered with inscriptions which are generally considered to be the work of early Christians, but which Mr. Forster—in defiance of all probability—took to be a contemporary record made by the Israelites after escaping from Egypt.

27. In a production: the Apologia pro Vita Sua: being A History of his Religious Opinions, published in book-form by Cardinal Newman in 1864, in answer to an attack upon his truthfulness and the teaching of Catholic moral theologians, made by Canon Kingsley. John Henry Newman (1801–90) matriculated at Trinity College, Oxford, 1816, became fellow of Oriel 1822, vicar of St. Mary's 1828, took a leading part in the Tractarian Movement of 1833, was received into the Catholic Church in 1845, became honorary fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, in 1877, and Cardinal of St. George in Velabro in 1879.

30. urbanity: this word, 'originally signifying no more than the pleasingness and purity of the language of the city in opposition to the language of the provinces, soon came to express a quality of polish or politeness, not only in speech and accent, but in the mind, in the manner and whole exterior of a person. Then with use and time it came to express still more and to signify a sort of social and moral quality which embellishes and strengthens social intercourse. Hard, rude, unsociable minds are excluded from urbanity; the peevish critic, even if he is right, cannot lay claim to it. Even melancholy minds are not admitted, for in every urbane nature there is a gay and cheerful foundation, there is a smile'. Sainte-Beuve, Causeries du Lundi, October, 1850.

39. the note of so and so: The New English Dictionary says that the use of this word in the sense of mark or indication of some quality was common from c. 1575 to 1690, and again from c. 1865. It was especially common in the sense of a characteristic by which the true Church may be known; but instances are found of its use in secular connexions from the time of Chaucer downwards.

PAGE 50. 11. classical: Aulus Gellius has 'classicus . . . scriptor, non proletarius', where the word means 'high-class' as opposed to 'low', and this is the main sense of classique in Cotgrave as well as in our earliest examples. Littré takes as his first sense of classique: 'Used in or belonging to the classes of colleges and schools.' The Greek and Roman authors read in school were actually the classical writers in these languages, and the extension of the term to writers, and also artists, of other countries and times can easily be understood.

12. All the scoriae: scoria (Gk. σκόρπια) is a Latin substantive, denoting the slag or dross remaining after the smelting out of a metal from its ore; hence used metaphorically of literature, as also of ideas, on p. 239, 19.

34. Jeremy Taylor: domestic chaplain to Charles I, author of Holy Living (1650) and Holy Dying (1651). After the Restoration he became Bishop of Down and Connor.

37. 'So have I seen': the comparison is to the 'strange evenness and untroubled passage' of Lady Carbery's religious life, 'sliding towards her ocean of God and infinity with a certain and silent motion'.

PAGE 51. 15. the Panegyric of St. Paul: delivered by Bossuet (for whom see note to p. 31, 21) on June 29, 1661, in the hospital of Saint Vincent de Paul at Paris. The extract may be translated: 'He will go with his ignorance of the art of correct speech, with his rude utterance, his phrasing that betrays the foreigner, he will go to this Greece so cultivated, the mother of philosophers and of orators; and there, in spite of the resistance of the world, he will found churches more numerous than the disciples whom Plato gained, in virtue of this eloquence which is deemed divine.'

27. 'Blindfold themselves', &c.: a passage towards the end of the Reflections on the Revolution in France, vol. ii, p. 509, London, 1871. The reference is to the expedients of issuing assignats resorted to by the National Assembly in order to avoid national bankruptcy: at their first issue they were of the nature of mortgage bonds secured upon the nationalized property; later, such assignats were made forced currency or legal tender; the worthlessness of this paper currency may be gauged from the fact that by March, 1796, the number of livres (pounds) in assignats that could be purchased for twenty-four livres in cash was 7,200.

34. 'They used it', &c.: A Letter to A Member of the National Assembly, ibid., p. 532.

40. 'Without one natural pang', &c.: A Letter, &c., ibid., p. 537. For Rousseau see note to p. 15, 10.

PAGE 52. 4. 'I confess', &c.: Reflections on the Revolution in France, ibid., p. 335. The allusion is to Dr. Price's sermon 'at the dissenting meeting-house of the Old Jewry', see note to p. 18, 11.

8. mercury sublimata: a preparation of mercury with sulphur, used medicinally, like cantharides, the Spanish blister-beetle, as a stimulant. Cantharides were anciently considered to be an aphrodisiac.

15. as the ancient critics: cf. Quintilian, Institutio Oratoria, x. 12: 'The distinction between Attic and Asiatic orators is indeed of great antiquity: the Attics being regarded as compressed and energetic in their style, the Asiatics as inflated and deficient in force.'

18. Addison's prose: Joseph Addison (1672-1719) collaborated with Steele in The Tatler until the paper ceased in 1711, and with his help founded The Spectator (March 1, 1711). His style has been well described as 'lucid, colloquial, full of individuality and yet chastened by that careful choice of words which he had already cultivated in writing Latin verse'.

34. Pascal: Blaise Pascal (1623-62), French geometrician and philosopher, famous in literature through his connexion with the Jansenist monastery of Port-Royal, and his defence of the Port-Royalists against the Jesuits in the eighteen Lettres Provinciales (1656-7). Eight years after his death appeared the Pensées de M. Pascal sur la religion et sur quelques autres sujets.

35. La Bruyère: Jean de la Bruyère (1645-96), French moralist and translator of Theophrastus, upon whom he modelled his famous Caractères—elaborate literary pictures of the physical and mental characteristics of individuals.

Vauvenargues: Luc de Clapiers, Marquis de Vauvenargues (1715-47), French moralist, best known by his Introduction à la connaissance de l'esprit humain, followed by Réflexions and Maximes.

PAGE 53. 12. Marmontel: Jean François Marmontel (1723-99) wrote for the Encyclopédie a series of articles on literature. His famous series of Contes moraux appeared in 1761.

17. 'Those who delight', &c.: The Spectator, No. 465, Saturday, August 23, 1711, on 'The Means of Strengthening Faith'.

34. Joubert: see essay on 'Joubert', pp. 163 sqq., and cf. p. 17, 3.

35. 'L'expérience', &c.: 'Experience of many opinions gives to the mind a large measure of flexibility, and at the same time strengthens it in those opinions which it believes to be the best.'

PAGE 54. 28. lenis minimeque pertinax: Cicero, De Officiis, i. 134.

32. what made Goethe say: in Kunst und Alterthum, III. i. (1821).

PAGE 55. 20. the Emperor of the French: the general tone of the Saturday Review was at this time hostile to Napoleon III. The third son of Louis Bonaparte, brother of Napoleon I, and Hortense Beauharnais, Louis Napoleon, after an adventurous career of political intrigue in exile, secured his election to the National Assembly in 1848, and on December 1, 1852, had himself proclaimed 'Emperor of the French'. The next few years saw him at the height of his power, through his alliance with England in the Crimean War, but from 1863 onwards his position became politically and personally more and more insecure until he was forced to abdicate after the crushing defeat of France by Germany in the war of 1870. Napoleon III died in exile in England in 1873.

22. academies: an allusion, apparently, to a review of L'Ancienne Académie des Sciences by Maury in the Saturday Review of July 9, 1864, in which the writer spoke of academies as being 'at present without an object' and useless, owing to the rise of the learned and scientific review.

24. Charlemagne instead of Charles the Great: the first of the Holy Roman Emperors, crowned Emperor of the West by Leo III in Rome on Christmas Day, 800. The name 'Charlemagne' is derived from French chansons de geste, 'Charles the Great' being a parallel form to the German 'Karl der Grosse', doubtless intended by the critic to emphasize the 'Teutonism' of the great Frank Emperor.

25. as Malebranche saw: Nicolas Malebranche (1638-1715), French Cartesian philosopher of Pantheistic tendency derived from Plato and St. Augustine, taught that knowledge is possible only in so far as thought is the expression not of the nature of the individual subject as such, but of universal life in which he and all other rational beings partake. This universal life in its source is God. In its development this philosophic theory is known as Occasionalism.

PAGE 56. 3. Mr. Ruskin: see note to p. 26, 29. The extract following is from Modern Painters, Part 4, xiv, 'Of Mediaeval Landscape'.

32. 'Of Shakspeare's names', &c.: Munera Pulveris, v, 'Of Government'. Ruskin himself spoke of this passage as 'worth a dozen of my old chapters'. He refers to the subject again in Val d'Arno, § 213. As to the correctness of the etymologies, with the exception of Hamlet and Othello, they are accurate enough, but their significance for Shakespeare is lessened by the fact that he found them already in the sources from which the plots are taken. Cf. note, p. 14, 2.

The correct meaning of Hamlet (Amleth or Amlhaide) seems to be 'mad'; and in modern Icelandic the word is used to signify an 'imbecile' or 'weak-minded person'. The reference is to Hamlet's feigned madness in the original story in Saxo Grammaticus's Historia Danica (thirteenth cent.), upon which Shakespeare's immediate source, the Histoires tragiques of Belleforest, is founded. Othello is more uncertainly derived.

PAGE 57. 9. ἡ εἶδος ἔχε, &c.: 'the peer in beauty of golden Aphrodite', said of Hermione, daughter of Menelaus and Helen, Odyssey iv. 14. But χρυσῆς should be χρυσέης, though the latter is always read as a disyllable in Homer.

24. Mr. Palgrave: Francis Turner Palgrave (1824-97), poet and critic, sometime secretary to Mr. Gladstone, art critic to the Saturday Review, published his Golden Treasury in 1864, held the Professorship of Poetry at Oxford, 1885-95.

29. two such pieces: Wordsworth's poem, 'To the Skylark', beginning 'Aethereal Minstrel! pilgrim of the sky!', is followed by Shelley's 'To a Skylark', beginning 'Hail to thee, blithe Spirit!'

PAGE 58. 2. Milton's line: from the sonnet entitled 'When the Assault was intended to the City', beginning 'Captain or Colonel or Knight in Arms'.

4. 'When Thebes was destroyed': Alexander the Great (355-323 B. C.) captured Thebes, which had won the leadership of Greece a generation before, in 335 B. C. Emathia was a district of Macedonia, whose boundaries at one time apparently embraced Pella, the birthplace of Alexander.

The story that Alexander spared the house of Pindar is to be found in Pliny, Hist. Nat. vii. 29; Aelian, Var. Hist. xiii. 7; and Dio Chrysostom, ii. 25: if it has any foundation in fact, the reason must have been that Pindar had sung the exploits of Alexander's ancestors.

5. Pindar: see note to p. 13, 41.

6. Louis XIV . . . Racine: Louis XIV (1638-1715) was the continued patron of Racine; hence the arbitrariness and 'violence' of Palgrave's note, unless it is based on the theory that sovereigns are ipso facto incapable of artistic sensibility.

22. the famous Handbook: Handbook to the Fine Art Collections in the International Exhibition of 1862, by F. T. Palgrave, Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. London, 1862.

PAGE 59. 6. Woolner: Thomas Woolner (1825-92), sculptor and poet, one of the original pre-Raphaelite brethren, became Academician in 1874 and Professor of Sculpture in 1879. The most notable of his works is considered to be the statue of John Stuart Mill on the Thames Embankment.

7. Davy: Sir Humphry Davy (1778-1829), natural philosopher, demonstrator of the elementary existence of potassium, sodium, and chlorine by the agency of the galvanic battery, and inventor of the safety-lamp (1815); President of the Royal Society (1820).

8. Faraday: Michael Faraday (1791-1867), natural philosopher, assistant to Sir Humphry Davy (1812), discoverer of benzol, magneto-electricity, and originator of the theory of the atom as the 'centre of force'.

9. Marochetti: Carlo Baron Marochetti (1805-67), an Italian sculptor, born at Turin, came to England in 1848 and practised his art in this country until his death. His better-known works include the statue of Wellington at Glasgow, the Inkerman monument in St. Paul's, the Angel at Apsley House, and Richard Cœur de Lion at Westminster. Palgrave spoke in the Handbook of one of Marochetti's works as 'a final masterpiece of colossal clumsiness'.

16. M. Gustave Planche: a criticism by Planche (1808-57), critic and contributor to the Revue des Deux Mondes, of Marochetti's statue of the Duc d'Orléans in the Court of the Louvre, appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes, August, 1845. He spoke of it as 'a child's toy seen through a magnifier: this sham spiritedness is simple puerility and scarcely worth discussion'.

PAGE 60. 6. a great deal more so: in his preface to the second edition of the Handbook (1862) Palgrave 'willingly and openly avowed that through inexperience in critical writing and the vastness of the field to be traversed he employed a few phrases which . . . took a character of hardness'.

7. Mr. Kinglake's Invasion of the Crimea: Alexander William Kinglake (1809-91), after a tour in the East described in Eothen (1844), followed the English expedition to the Crimea. The first two volumes of his history of the war were published in 1863, and the whole work was completed in 1887.

A writer in the Quarterly Review, April, 1863, thus criticizes Kinglake's style: 'the attempt at lofty display is sometimes so absurd as to excite laughter. The style is too laboured and artificial, and palls from the sustained pomp and polish of the language. Events of the most unequal importance are related in the same stilted and magniloquent periods, and the mind at last gets weary from the constant strain.'

12. Mr. James Gordon Bennett: this famous American journalist (1795-1872) founded the New York Herald in 1835 as a small four-page sheet at a cent a copy. Bennett wrote the entire newspaper, making up for lack of news by sensational opinions, fictitious intelligence, and reckless personal attacks. The paper became popular, and during the civil war employed sixty-three war correspondents. It was as a collector of news that Bennett excelled, and in his unerring judgement how to engross the interest of his readers.

18. the Corinthian style: this use of the epithet to connote an over-brilliant literary style is peculiar to Arnold; in Culture and Anarchy he speaks of 'a flight of Corinthian leading-articles'. Cf. Quintilian, Instit. Orat. viii. 3. 26.

PAGE 61. 2. like Pontius Pilate: an allusion to John xix. 22.

9. M. de Bazancourt: César de Bazancourt (1810-65), author of L'Expédition de Crimée jusqu'à la prise de Sébastopol, Paris, 1856-7, which ran through many editions.

10. M. Thiers: Louis Adolphe Thiers (1797-1877), historian and statesman, President of the Republic from 1871-3, published his Histoire de la Révolution Française in ten volumes between 1823 and 1827, and continued it with the Histoire du Consulat et de l'Empire in twenty volumes from 1845 to 1862. Thiers was an orator and a journalist rather than an historian; his work is marked by great eloquence and lucidity of arrangement, but marred by declamation and misleading partiality.

19. 'à être l'effroi', &c.: 'to be the horror of a world whose love she might have been'.

26. Marshal St. Arnaud: Jacques Achille de St. Arnaud (1796-1854), commander-in-chief of the French army in the Crimea. He co-operated with Lord Raglan in the battle of the Alma (1854) and died shortly afterwards.

27. Lord Raglan: Fitzroy James Henry Somerset (1788-1855), youngest son of the first Duke of Beaufort, commanded the British troops in the Crimea, won the battles of the Alma and Inkerman, and died shortly after the ill-timed attacks on Malakhoff and Redan (1855).

Lord Stratford: Stratford Canning, first Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe (1786-1880), became ambassador at Constantinople in 1842, and in this capacity persuaded the British government to embark upon the Crimean War in alliance with Turkey.

'dismissed from the presence': the quotations are from the second volume of the Invasion, pp. 33 sqq., and refer to the meeting at the British Embassy when St. Arnaud, 'the light, agile Frenchman', asked for the command of the Turkish army.

29. 'the great Elchi': this title had been gained by Canning as early as 1809, when he was first secretary at Constantinople. 'Elchi' [Turkish ilchi] = minister, 'Great Elchi' = 'full ambassador' or 'ambassador par excellence'.

PAGE 62. 17. the establishment of an Academy: the British Academy for the promotion of historical, philosophical, and philological studies was incorporated by charter in 1902; it consists of a hundred members, governed by a president and fifteen councillors elected annually, but it makes no pretence of being a 'sovereign organ of opinion', nor has it any purely literary activity.

22. Barrow: Isaac Barrow (1630-77), divine, mathematical and classical scholar, Professor of Greek at Cambridge (1660), and first Lucasian professor of mathematics there (1663). His Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy (1680) is considered one of the most finished pieces of polemical writing extant, and his sermons take rank among the finest in the language.

27. like that of Berlin: the Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin originated in the Societas Regia Scientiarum, founded in 1700 by Frederick I on the plan of Leibnitz, its first president. Its present constitution dates from 1812.

34. as Chalmers's: Alexander Chalmers (1759-1834), born at Aberdeen, migrated to London, where he became an active writer for the press and a miscellaneous man of letters. Besides editing many British authors he reproduced the British Essayists, from the Tatler to the Observer, in forty-five volumes; but he is best known by his General Biographical Dictionary in thirty-two volumes (1812-14), based on an earlier work of Tooke, Nares, and Beloe.

a recent one of Spinoza: the translation of his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus criticized in the Essay on 'Spinoza and the Bible', p. 193, 10. Published anonymously, it was the work of a physician, Robert Willis, and appeared in 1863.

MAURICE DE GUÉRIN

This Essay was first published in Fraser's Magazine, January, 1863. References to quotations from Maurice de Guérin in these notes are to the edition of his Journal, Letters, and Poems, by Trebutien, Paris, 1890.

PAGE 64. 3. some fifteen years ago: when Arnold, who had been elected to a fellowship at Oriel College, Oxford, in 1845, held the post of private secretary to Lord Lansdowne, at that time Lord President of the Council.

4. this sentence: Le Centaure, p. 385. 'Somewhere the jealous Gods have buried the evidences of universal descent; but by the shore of what sea have they rolled to the stone that covers them, O Macareus?'

13. Madame Sand: Amandine Lucile Aurore Dudevant (1804-76), French novelist and writer, under the pseudonym of 'George Sand'. Her novels are romantic, or descriptive of rustic life. The article in the Revue des Deux Mondes appeared May 15, 1840.

17. at the end of a volume: the volume containing La Dernière Aldini, Myrza, Les Visions de la Nuit.

27. M. Trebutien: a distinguished French antiquarian; librarian at Caen.

28. M. Sainte-Beuve: see note to p. 40, 4. Cf. Sainte-Beuve, Causeries du Lundi, vol. xii; Nouveaux Lundis, vol. iii.

PAGE 65. 17. Linnaeus: Carl von Linné (1707-78), the founder of modern botany, held the chair of Botany at Upsala, in Sweden. In his Species Plantarum (1753) he established the custom of adding a second or trivial name to the generic name, in order to identify plants. His genius was specially shown in classification.

Cavendish: Henry Cavendish (1731-1810), English chemist and physicist, member of the French Institute, discovered the compound nature of water and the composition of nitric acid.

Cuvier: Georges Léopold Chrétien Frédéric Dagobert Cuvier (1769-1832), French naturalist, was the chief of modern comparative anatomists, making a special study of mollusca, fishes, fossil mammals, and reptiles. His principal work is the Règne animal distribué d'après son organisation.

20. Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv. iii. 118.

24. Wordsworth: 'The Solitary Reaper,' stanza 2.

29. Keats: from his last sonnet, 'Bright star, would I were stedfast as thou art'. Arnold misquotes and spoils the beauty of the lines by writing 'cold ablution' for 'pure ablution'.

32. Chateaubriand: Atala, p. 63. (Édition Lutetia.) François René de Chateaubriand (1768-1848), French politician, poet, and man of letters, was unquestionably the greatest French writer in the estimation of his contemporaries. He was the father of the French Romantic movement.

cime indéterminée, &c.: 'wavering summit of the forests.'

33. Senancour: Obermann; letter 11: 'its white smooth crannied bark, its rustic trunk, its branches drooping towards the ground, the quivering of its leaves and all its air of abandonment, its natural simplicity, its desert-aspect'. See note to p. 27, 32.

PAGE 66. 2. the Alexandrine: Alexandrines are rhyming verses, consisting each of twelve syllables or six measures, the sixth syllable always ending a word. Drayton's Polyolbion is the only considerable English poem in this metre, though an Alexandrine is used to end the Spenserian stanza and sometimes for the second line of a heroic couplet. Cf. Pope, Essay in Criticism, 359:

A needless Alexandrine ends the song,

That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.

The metre derives its name from the old French poem on Alexander the Great (1180-90), where the metre is first used, or from the name of one of its authors, Alexander de Bernay.

Fénelon: François de Salignac de la Mothe-Fénelon (1651-1715), bishop of Cambrai, author of Télémaque, sermons, fables, and many other works.

26. Racine: Jean Racine (1639-99), French tragedian, began his dramatic work at the time of Corneille's decline. But while Corneille's drama was historical and poetical, Racine's was romantic and passionate.

35. Gray hardly uses that couplet: he uses it in the fragment The Alliance of Education and Government, in Epitaphs, xx and xxii, and in some translations.

PAGE 67. 2. (as Chaucer uses it): Chaucer used the ten-syllable couplet in The Canterbury Tales which contain some 18,000 lines of verse, and in the Legende of Good Women.

6. Pope, in his Essay on Man: Pope published the first epistle of the Essay on Man anonymously in 1733, and completed the fourth epistle in 1734. He tells us that 'the author chose this manner, notwithstanding his subject was high of dignity, because of its being mixed with argument which of its nature approacheth to prose'. So too Dryden in Religio Laici:

And this unpolished rugged form I chose

As fittest for discourse and nearest prose.

The gravest defect in Pope's verse is not his 'vehicle' but incorrectness of grammar, caused by frequent ellipses.

7. Lucretius in his poem on Nature: the De Rerum Natura of Lucretius (97-53 B. C.), a philosophical treatise in hexameters, is a scientific exposition of the 'atomistic' system of Epicurus.

12. the Epistles and Satires of Horace: the Satires (35-29 B. C.) were the principal work of the first, and the Epistles of the last, ten years of Quintus Horatius Flaccus's life (65-68 B. C.). They tell us how Horace regarded the actual world of business, of pleasure, of society, and literature.

21. Bacon: his chief works are the Advancement of Learning (1605), New Atlantis (1614-18), Novum Organum (1620), and the Essays (in their final form, 1625).

23. Milton, writing prose: Milton devoted the middle twenty years of his life to prose polemics, of which the greatest are Areopagitica (1644), The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1643), and Eikonoclastes (1650).

PAGE 68. 1. Abbé Lamennais: Félicité Robert de Lamennais (1782-1854) was ordained priest in 1816, and the following year published his Essay on Indifference in the Matter of Religion in which he denounced the right of private judgement and argued that all authority rested in the Holy See. In 1824 Leo XII offered him a cardinal's hat, which he declined. He gradually, however, became imbued with more liberal ideas, and in the journal L'Avenir, which he founded in 1830, with the motto 'The Pope and the People', he gave such expression to the idea of popular liberty that Gregory XVI suppressed the paper in the following year and bitterly censured the champion of freedom. Lamennais retired to La Chênaie, and wrote thenceforth as the apostle of the people alone. He was never reconciled to the church, and was buried by his own wish without any religious rites.

9. Lacordaire: Jean-Baptiste Henri Lacordaire (1802-61), ordained priest in 1827, helped Lamennais with L'Avenir, and after its suppression continued to assert the people's sovereignty in civil life and the papal supremacy in religion. In 1838 he joined the Dominican order, of which he became the Provincial twelve years later. He was chiefly known as a preacher, his funeral orations especially being unsurpassed. The last seven years of his life he passed in retirement as director of a private Lycée near Toulouse, where Arnold visited him (see Arnold, 'A French Eton').

M. de Montalembert: Charles Forbes René de Montalembert (1810-70), best known for his great work Les Moines d'Occident depuis St. Benoît jusqu'à St. Bernard (1860-7), was also involved in L'Avenir, and continued to speak for popular liberties in the Chamber and afterwards in the National Assembly till he lost his seat in 1857. To the end of his life he remained a determined opponent of the Second Empire.

11. the Abbé Gerbet: Olympe Philippe Gerbet, later Bishop of Perpignan.

12. the Abbé Rohrbacher: François René Rohrbacher, writer of Histoire Universelle de l'Église (1842-9).

33. that which Goethe calls Halt: 'stability' or 'poise' is the common meaning of Halt; there does not appear to be any particular passage in Goethe to which Arnold here refers; but the need of Halt is the main lesson of Goethe's drama Torquato Tasso.

40. writes one of his hearers: these details are quoted from Impressions et Souvenirs of Monsieur du Breuil de Marzan, appended to M. Trebutien's edition of Maurice de Guérin, pp. 430 sqq.

PAGE 69. 20. almost as unfit as Shelley's: Shelley's biographer relates that the persecutions which the shy and sensitive boy underwent from his schoolfellows at Sion House Academy, Brentford, where he was sent to school at the age of ten, inspired him with the horror of oppression and indomitable spirit of resistance which actuated his whole life.

34. 'renovation without end': quoted from Wordsworth's 'Address to my infant daughter Dora'. It is quoted again in 'Pagan and Mediaeval Sentiment', p. 153, 16.

PAGE 70. 8. the younger members: specially Hippolyte de la Morvonnais, Elie de Kertanguy, François du Breuil de Marzan.

19. 'La Chénaie is': Trebutien, p. 181.

38. 'To-day': ibid. p. 8.

PAGE 71. 10. 'It has snowed': p. 12.

20. 'sitting in the sun': p. 25.

22. 'one can actually see': p. 36.

34. 'the gloomy and bad days': p. 192.

37. 'This Brittany of ours': p. 38. The quotation occurs in the Journal as well.

PAGE 72. 4. 'What a difference': Journal, June 13, 1833.

12. 'What a sunshine': in a letter to Hippolyte de la Morvonnais, February, 1834.

29. Bernardin de St. Pierre: p. 42. Jacques Henri Bernardin de Saint-Pierre (1737-1814), by profession an engineer, adopted the sentimental morality of Rousseau and his love of nature. Paul et Virginie is his best book, but La Chaumière Indienne may be classed with it, and the Études de la Nature to which Guérin refers is half fiction.

Chateaubriand: p. 4. 'I read René again on a day when my heart seemed dead.'

30. Lamartine: Alphonse Marie Louis de Prat de Lamartine (1790-1869), statesman, poet, and historian, was elected to the Academy for his second volume of poems in 1829. His verse, though refined and delicate, is wanting in vigour, see below, p. 73, 27.

Victor Hugo: Victor Marie Hugo (1802-85), the recognized leader of the Romantic school in France both in poetry and the drama, and hardly less famous in his prose works. His genius for rhythm and rhyme is unequalled in French literature.

32. from English authors: e.g. Fenimore Cooper (p. 10), Sheridan (p. 468); there are also allusions to Horace (p. 142), Virgil (p. 274), Plato (p. 138).

33. 'Every poet': p. 186; in a letter of April 29, 1833.

PAGE 73. 1. 'that youthful literature': p. 283; in a letter to M. de la Morvonnais, February, 1834.

8. 'whose name appears': ibid.

'the writers of books': ibid.

26. 'I want you to reform': p. 317; in a letter of August 13, 1834.

PAGE 74. 4. One Friday in April: p. 25. April 5, 1833.

19. in a letter: p. 189. May 8, 1833.

27. 'Three days have passed': p. 25. April 10, 1833.

PAGE 75. 17. 'Do you know what it is?': p. 39. May 9, 1833.

28. Another time: p. 19. March 24, 1833.

PAGE 76. 19. Ploërmel: Les Frères de l'Instruction Chrétienne had a house here.

21. as he says somewhere: I have not found the reference.

28. 'to put in practice': p. 217; in a letter to M. du Breuil de Marzan, October 2, 1833.

PAGE 77. 9. 'How full of goodness': p. 56.

30. 'descends from Carmel': where the prophets Elijah and Elisha had retired from the persecution of Ahab and his successor.

36. one extract more: p. 62.

PAGE 79. 8. 'All the sky': p. 60.

38. 'I enter the world': p. 73.

40. White of Selborne: Gilbert White (1720-93), naturalist and vicar of Selborne, author of the famous Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne.

PAGE 80. 4. One of his Brittany acquaintances: M. Paul Quemper, to whom Guérin wrote several of the letters in M. Trebutien's collection.

11. 'I have only got to write': in a letter of February 2, 1834.

19. Goldsmith: Goldsmith became an usher in a dissenters' school at Peckham for some months in 1756-7.

poor Hartley Coleridge: Hartley Coleridge (1796-1849), eldest son of the poet, on being dismissed for intemperance from his Oxford fellowship and failing in the literary work which he undertook in London, became a master at Ambleside School, Westmorland, where he had been as a boy.

25. in his own words: p. 318; in a letter to Eugénie, September 10, 1834.

28. 'The master of the fifth class': p. 326; in a letter to M. de la Morvonnais, October 10, 1834.

39. agrégé-ès-lettres: ès is contracted from en les: cf. Pascal, Provinciales, 3, 'ès choses temporelles'.

PAGE 81. 9. Creole: In the West Indies, and other parts of America and Mauritius, Creole denotes a descendant of European settlers, born and naturalized in those regions and more or less modified in type by the climate and surroundings. The name has no connotation of colour.

10. to use his own words: p. 370; in a letter to M. de la Morvonnais, November 8, 1838.

13. 'the blind Fury,' &c.: quoted from Milton, Lycidas, 75; Milton has confused the Furies and the Fates.

15. 'I pass my life': p. 372; in a letter to Eugénie, April 8, 1839.

28. 'To-night there will go forth': p. 292. The final condemnation was contained in the Encyclical Singulari nos, June 25, 1834.

32. 'I assure you': p. 357.

39. 'it has forgotten': p. 283; in a letter to M. de la Morvonnais, Paris, February, 1834.

PAGE 82. 1. a 'deplorable revolution': in the biographical memoir appended to the Journal.

12. 'disengaged from the social tumult': p. 87; Journal, June 26, 1834.

15. M. Sainte-Beuve tells of him: in the Prefatory Notice, p. xxxiii.

21. 'I owe everything': p. 5; August 13, 1832.

39. Wordsworth thus speaks:

Nor less I deem that there are Powers

Which of themselves our minds impress;

That we can feed this mind of ours

In a wise passiveness.

'Expostulation and Reply,' 24.

PAGE 83. 3. '. . . the glow, the thrill of life': Arnold, 'Stanzas in memory of the Author of Obermann'.

12. '. . . I am but a voice': Hyperion, i. 340.

20. 'I return, as you see': p. 467; on a fragmentary letter, April 11, 1838.

31. 'My imagination welcomes': p. 105; Journal, December 10, 1834.

35. 'The longer I live': p. 92; Journal, Paris, August 20, 1834.

PAGE 84. 8. 'When one is a wanderer': p. 320; in a letter, September 10, 1834.

10. the last entry: October 13, 1835. The same thought occurs in a letter of the same date to M. de la Morvonnais, p. 352.

19. Lord Houghton: Richard Monckton Milnes (1809-85), first Baron Houghton (1863), was for some time M. P. for Pontefract, and published several volumes of poems and contributions to political and social questions.

20. David Gray: The Luggie and other Poems by David Gray, with a Memoir by James Hedderwick and a prefatory notice by R. M. Milnes, M. P. London. 1862. David Gray (1838-61) was born on the banks of the Luggie near Glasgow, and, after teaching in a school there, came to London in 1860. He was befriended by Mr. Milnes, who persuaded Macmillan, the publisher, to print his poems.

30. 'My inward misery': p. 80; May 18, 1834.

34. 'Craving, unquiet': p. 116; April 3, 1835.

PAGE 85. 26. 'δράσαντι παθεῖν': 'the doer must suffer.' Aeschylus, Choephoroe, 313; cf. also fragment 267.

'ἀνήριθμον γέλασμα': 'countless laughter.' Aeschylus, Prometheus Vincetus, 90.

28. 'Full many a glorious': Sonnet 33.

31. 'There's a divinity': Hamlet, v. ii. 10.

PAGE 86. 25. on the Isis: in Egyptian mythology Isis was the sister and wife of Osiris and mother of Horus; the mysteries of Isis represented the murder of Osiris, the lamentation of Isis, the triumph of Horus over Seth, and the resurrection amidst rejoicings of the slain god. Proclus mentions an Isiac inscription, 'I am that which is, has been, and shall be. My veil no one has lifted. The fruit I bore was the Sun.'

30. 'My spirit': Journal, July 16, 1834.

PAGE 87. 10. 'It seems to me': p. 76; ibid., March 23, 1834.

16. 'High above my head': p. 79; ibid., May 7, 1834.

23. 'When I begin': ibid., June 10, 1834.

PAGE 90. 6. Cybele: a Phrygian goddess, 'Mother of the Gods,' worshipped with ecstatic and orgiastic rites. Cf. the Atys of Catullus.

PAGE 91. 1. Chiron: the greatest and wisest of the Centaurs, tutor of Jason, Hercules, Aesculapius, and Achilles.

34. the rainy Hyades: from Gk. ὕειν, 'to make wet.' The setting of this constellation, either at morning or evening twilight, was for Greeks and Romans a presage of wet weather, as this happened in the latter half of April and November respectively.

35. the Pleiades: their rising and setting indicated the opening and the close of the sailing season.

EUGÉNIE DE GUÉRIN

This essay appeared in the Cornhill Magazine, June 1863.

References are to the edition of the Journal by Trebutien, Paris, 1862.

PAGE 92. 4. 'There is nothing fixed': p. 443; Journal, September 17, 1844.

9. 'Orestes and Pylades': like David and Jonathan, or Damon and Pythias, one of the famous pairs of friends in antiquity. After the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemnestra, his son Orestes was sent to Phocis, to the court of King Strophius, and was there brought up with Pylades, the king's son. Chrysothemis was the sister of Electra, Agamemnon's daughter, but proved disloyal to her father's memory.

17. 'let what he did': p. 476; quoted from a letter to M. de la Morvonnais, March 10, 1841.

22. 'furnished to others': quoted from a letter to the same, July 2, 1842.

23. in the journal of a young girl: p. 447; the passage is quoted from the Journal, 1842; the month and day are not given.

30. 'that winning, delicate, and beautifully happy turn': there is no hint as to the origin of this quotation, unless it is an adaptation of a phrase in Eugénie's Journal, p. 383, June 9, 1840,—'cette douce, délicate et si fine façon de parler douleur.'

PAGE 93. 9. Ten years afterwards: the Journal, &c., of Maurice de Guérin were published by M. Trebutien in 1860.

19. He published the journal: in 1862.

25. a writer in the National Review: vol. xii, 1861. This was a review of the volume published for private circulation by Barbey d'Aurévilly and Trébutien, in 1855.

PAGE 94. 1. Her family . . . was noble: the family of de Guérin is found established in France in the ninth century, when a Guérin, or Guarini, was Count of Auvergne.

6. on the day of Bouvines: Bouvines is a village seven miles south-east of Lille, where in 1214 the French defeated the Emperor Otto IV, who was at the head of a combined force of Germans, Flemish, and English. Senlis is about forty miles north-east of Paris.

8. 'one may pass days,' &c.: I have not traced this quotation.

36. 'two eyes looking out of one head': p. 462; in a letter to the Baroness de Maistre, 1839.

40. the wish: references to it in the Journal belong mostly to the period after her brother's death, and then always for a 'sisterhood' engaged in active work like nursing. In February 1838 she could look forward to a country cottage, with plain wooden furniture, a vine-trellis, poultry, and a husband.

41. There is a trace: p. 317; December 31, 1839. This cousin, Victor, died at Versailles, in 1829.

PAGE 95. 6. 'to Maurice in heaven': this dedication stands at the head of the ninth cahier, beginning July 21, 1839.

15. M. Sainte-Beuve goes so far as to say: in the Notice prefixed to the Journal of Maurice de Guérin he speaks of Eugénie as 'his equal, if not his superior in talent and in soul'.

32. the Nivernais: a district in France on the east of the Loire, nearly corresponding to the modern department of Nièvre.

33. 'It does one good': p. 262; Journal, May 1, 1839.

41. 'I have been along the Loire': p. 351; Journal, in a letter to M. de la Morvonnais, 1835.

PAGE 96. 4. Chambord: ten miles from Blois, this celebrated château of 440 apartments, once a hunting-box of the Counts of Blois, was rebuilt by Francis I and Henry II. The comedy of Molière, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, was played for the first time in the theatre there.

Blois: the most famous château of the family of Orleans, thirty-five miles south-west of Orleans. Here Henry Duke of Guise was assassinated by order of Henry III, and Marie de Médicis, wife of Henry IV, lived in exile from the Court.

Amboise: this château, twelve miles from Tours, was built by Charles VIII, Louis XII, and Francis I. In the chapel lie the remains of Leonardo da Vinci (d. 1519).

Chenonceaux: Henry II gave this château, twenty miles south of Tours, to Diane of Poitiers, who was forced by Catherine de Médicis to exchange it for Chaumont-sur-Loire.

10. 'ce beau torrent': p. 104; Journal, December 10, 1834.

20. a friend whom he was recommending: Hippolyte de la Morvonnais, in a letter from Paris, March 4, 1835.

32. Saint François de Sales: François de Sales (1567-1622), bishop of Geneva, beatified in 1626 and declared 'doctor of the Church' in 1877. He is best known by his Introduction to a Devout Life (1609) and the Treatise on the Love of God (1616).

36. Saint Theresa: Teresa de Cepeda (1515-82), Spanish mystic, entered the Carmelite Order at eighteen, but declares that her conversion only dated from 1554, when she was nearly forty years old. She brought about the reform of the Carmelite convents in Spain and wrote numerous treatises of ascetical and mystical theology, notably the Life by Herself, the Way of Perfection, and the Interior Castle. The reference is to the Journal, August 21, 1836.

PAGE 97. 8. 'There are days': p. 155; February 12, 1838.

11. 'Poor soul, poor soul': p. 201; Journal, May 12, 1838.

25. 'the counsel of Fénelon': the reference appears to be to his Lettres Spirituelles, No. 37, Œuvres, vol. i, p. 473.

27. 'This morning I was suffering': p. 181; Journal, April 2, 1838.

PAGE 98. 12. as Goethe . . . calls him: this is the only reference to Pascal in the works of Goethe. It occurs at the close of a review in the Frankfurter Gelehrten Anzeigen of Münter's history of the conversion of Count Struensee (1772). Works (Weimar edition), vol. xxxvii, p. 256.

27. the magnificent words of Bossuet: I have not traced the quotation: the sentiment is very common in Bossuet, notably in the Oraisons Funèbres.

PAGE 99. 1. 'I do not say': p. 198; in a letter, June 21, 1833.

8. 'You see, my dear Tortoise': p. 271; in a letter, February 2, 1834.

18. And she says of herself: p. 64; April 29, 1835.

33. the Albigensians: so called from Albiga, the modern Albi, in Languedoc, a twelfth- and thirteenth-century sect that revived the teachings of the Manichaeans of the third century. Most of our knowledge of them is derived from hostile and exaggerated accounts; from these it would seem that their anxiety for a reform of existing abuses in the Church led them, first of all, to a false spirituality, and then, by an easy inference from the worthlessness of the body, to gross immoralities in practice. They were ruthlessly hunted down and exterminated by ecclesiastical authority.

the Camisards: this was the name given to the peasantry of the Cevennes, who from 1702-5 carried on an organized military resistance to the dragonnades, or forced conversion by means of torture, confiscation, and death, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Camisade is an obsolete French word for 'a night-attack', so called from the shirt (chemise) worn over the armour as a means of recognition.

PAGE 100. 28. 'Ceci n'est pas pour le public': p. 91; August 24, 1835.

32. 'We see things': p. 144; January 27, 1838.

PAGE 101. 2. 'I am furious': p. 6; November 18, 1834.

13. Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church: there is no clue to the identity of this French work.

14. 'Que de mouts aqui dédins!': patois for 'Que de mots là-dedans!'

26. 'Saint Brice's day': November 13; St. Brice was Bishop of Tours; he died in 444.

34. When a literary friend: M. Hippolyte de la Morvonnais.

PAGE 102. 22. the list of her library: p. 430; taken from a manuscript book amongst her papers.

23. The Letters of Saint Theresa: p. 123; May 7, 1837. A French edition of these was published by L'Abbé Pelicot in 1660 and another by Migne in 1840.

26. 'What then?': p. 123; May 7, 1837.

28. the Imitation: the De Imitatione Christi is traditionally ascribed to Thomas à Kempis (1379-1471), so called from his birth-place Kempen, his surname being Haemerken.

the Spiritual Works of Bossuet and Fénelon: the list mentions the Lettres Spirituelles, the Méditations [sur l'Évangile], and the Élévations sur les Mystères of Bossuet, as also a work, presumably a collection of extracts, entitled Heures de Fénelon. Besides these she possessed the Lettres Spirituelles of Fénelon, a long-desired present from her father. Cf. Journal, August 4, 1835.

Madame de Staël's book: Anne Louise Germaine Necker, Baronne de Staël-Holstein (1766-1817), brought out in 1808 a study of the Romantic movement in Germany, called De l'Allemagne, which brought upon her the displeasure of Napoleon and caused her to be sent into exile. Cf. Essay on 'Joubert', p. 166, 31.

33. the Promessi Sposi of Manzoni: Alessandro Manzoni (1785-1873), Italian poet and novelist, published his first tragedy Il Conte di Carmagnola, in 1819. The historical novel, I Promessi Sposi (The Betrothed Lovers), was completed and published in 1827.

36. her chambrette: the Journal is full of allusions to this 'little room' where the Journal was usually written. 'Chez moi' is the only French equivalent for 'home', the thing and the name being the property of Teutonic, not Latin, nationality.

41. 'I find writing': p. 64; April 24, 1835.

PAGE 103. 20. 'Would to God': p. 31; January 3, 1835: the first three lines are effaced in the manuscript.

30. My journal: p. 35; March 1, 1835.

41. It is from the Cross: p. 92; August 27, 1835. The friend was M. de la Morvonnais whose wife had just died, leaving him with an infant daughter.

PAGE 104. 25. 'Cloaks, clogs': p. 16; November 29, 1834.

PAGE 105. 11. 'Christmas is come': p. 29; December 31, 1834.

16. 'nadalet': the Languedoc patois for Noel is Nadal; hence the term for this peal of bells, rung for a fortnight before Christmas.

32. 'the communion-table': this is a curious translation of 'le saint Sacrement'.

PAGE 106. 18. the memoir and poems: Memoir of Emma Tatham, Author of The Dream of Pythagoras and other Poems, by Benjamin Gregory, with The Angels' Spell and other pieces not published during her lifetime. London, 1859.

23. a sincere vein of poetic feeling: thus she says of Shelley, 'as I quaffed his magnificent madneses, my spirit reeled to the exquisite intoxication'; she praises Mrs. Hemans, 'the sweet seraphic Felicia, the nightingale of the moral sentiments and social affections, as Montgomery is of the religious'; but she is doubtful of Longfellow, 'a fine poet but too much inclined to Puseyism—the outward form and rite, I think': she adds, however, elsewhere, 'I never criticize my beloved poets; I only love them.'

34. her chapel of moss: the 'repositor', adorned with flowers and candles, in which the Host is kept in Catholic churches from Holy Thursday to Good Friday.

36. her quoting: p. 61; April 15, 1835. All that Eugénie says is that the life of Saint Macedonius, which she would read in her Lives of the Saints that day, is 'charming'.

38. Saint Macedonius: surnamed Crithophagus or 'wheat-eater', i. e. 'vegetarian', a hermit of the Thebaid. The story is told in Theodoret's Historia Religiosa, c. 13, apud Migne, Patrol. Graeca, vol. lxxxii.

41. the story of the ten disobedient children: the incident is related in the De Civitate Dei, Bk. XXII, last paragraph. The point of the quotation is that the disobedient children had been first cursed by their mother for their disobedience. Saint Augustine, bishop of Hippo and one of the four great doctors of the Western Church, wrote his Confessions about A. D. 397 and the De Civitate Dei between 413 and 426.

PAGE 107. 17. This ought ye: Luke xi. 42.

PAGE 108. 2. 'La Confession': 'Confession is only the expansion of repentance into love', p. 108; March 12, 1836.

5. cher pèlerinage: 'dear pilgrimage', p. 94; August 29, 1835.

6. laissé tant de misères: 'left so many miseries', p. 108; March 12, 1836.

7. 'This morning': p. 15; November 28, 1834.

22. 'the more the heart': p. 109; March 12, 1836.

24. 'has so loved us': an allusion to the words said to have been addressed by Our Lord to Margaret Mary Alacoque (1647-90), bidding her to revive the devotion to the Sacred Heart:

Behold this heart, which has so loved men!

28. 'What a grief for me!': p. 107; March 12, 1836.

PAGE 109. 4. 'To-day I am going': this quotation cannot be traced.

12. She tells us: p. 37; March 7, 1835. The image, however, was a picture of Our Lord on the Cross, and hung in her father's room.

19. 'Oh, how well': p. 85; June 31, 1835.

23. 'The mystery': p. 336; January 26, 1840.

26. 'It was necessary': Luke xxiv. 46.

33. 'My God': p. 118; No date, 1836.

36. 'If thou, O Lord': Psalm cxxx. 3.

PAGE 110. 14. 'Notwithstanding this': p. 203; May 14, 1838.

32. 'Change your brains': Saint François de Sales founded the Order of Nuns of the Visitation to work among the poor and the sick in 1610; the saying here quoted most probably relates to them.

41. 'Oh, the agony': p. 394; July 30, 1840. The reference is distinctly not to Maurice, who died a most edifying death in 1839, but to a suicide at Andillac: Eugénie contrasts the two tombs.

PAGE 111. 8. 'Sorrowful, even unto death': Matthew xxvi. 38.

'These six months': p. 335; this and the following extract are from the Journal, January 26, 1840.

PAGE 112. 8. 'God knows': p. 264; May 4, 1839.

31. 'He coughs': p. 271; May 21, 1839.

PAGE 113. 2. 'that beloved face': p. 332; January 21, 1840.

'that beautiful head': ibid.

5. 'I have seen': p. 280; August 4, 1839.

22. 'Poor beloved soul': p. 276; July 21, 1839.

38. 'I am broken down': p. 283; August 20, 1839.

PAGE 114. 21. 'this return': p. 373; May 1, 1840.

27. 'I am dying': p. 375; [May], 1840.

40. 'So beautiful': p. 401; [August], 1840.

PAGE 115. 1. 'that Spanish grandee': this story is told of St. Francis Borgia (1510-72), Duke of Gandia and subsequently General of the Jesuit order. He was sent to the Court of the Emperor Charles V in 1528, and in 1539, when the Empress died, was deputed to carry the body to Granada. The sight of the body of the once beautiful Empress is said so to have impressed him with the transitoriness of earthly greatness that he joined the Jesuit Order.

4. La Trappe: a Cistercian abbey in the diocese of Sées in Normandy, founded in 1140 and reformed to a much stricter observance by Armand de Rancé who became abbot in 1664. The Trappists have the most severe rule of all monks living in community.

9. a day or two afterwards: the last entry is on December 31, 1840, but there are fragments written at Paris in the following year, and a note written on December 31, 1842, at Le Cayla.

19. letter of the 22nd: to M. Paul Quemper at Paris, to whom was entrusted the task of collecting for publication the various articles and fragments left by Maurice.

39. lucida sidera: 'bright shining stars': quoted from Horace, Odes, i. 3. 2 'fratres Helenae, lucida sidera' . . . The 'stars' are Castor and Pollux, the twin-brethren of Roman mythology.

HEINRICH HEINE

This essay was first delivered as a lecture at Oxford in June 1863, and subsequently appeared in the August number of the Cornhill Magazine. Of the lecture Arnold wrote to his mother, 'I have been very busy with my lecture on Heine which much interested me; there was one thing which even a wooden Oxford audience gave way to—Heine's wit. I gave them about two pages of specimens of it and they positively laughed aloud' (June 16, 1863).

PAGE 116. 1. 'I know not': Reisebilder, 'Journey from Munich to Genoa'; Werke, vol. ii. 145. Hamburg, 1861-84.

9. genus irritabile: Horace, Epistles, ii. 2. 102; 'testy race of poets':

Multa fero ut placem genus irritabile vatum cum scribo et supplex populi suffragia capto.

27. his labours on German literature: these comprise various articles in the Edinburgh Review on 'The State of German Literature' (1827); in the Foreign Review on 'Goethe' (1828), on 'Novalis' (1829), and on 'Jean Paul Richter' (1830); and in Fraser's Magazine on 'Schiller' (1831).

PAGE 117. 3. the romantic school: this school came into being with the foundation of the Athenaeum by August and Friedrich Schlegel in 1798 as a protest not so much against the classicism of Weimar as against the materialism of Berlin influence.

Tieck: Ludwig Tieck (1773-1853), the most prolific writer of the school, published collections of popular tales and songs, translated Don Quixote, and continued Schlegel's translation of Shakespeare.

Novalis: this was the pseudonym chosen by Friedrich von Hardenberg (1772-1801), author of Heinrich von Ofterdingen, the characteristic novel of the Romantic School, relating the wanderings of the hero in search of the Blue Flower, the symbol of ideal poetry. The Hymnen an die Nacht and the Geistliche Lieder contain passages of the greatest beauty; the philosophical and critical Fragmente reveal him as the disciple of Fichte and Schelling.

4. Jean Paul Richter: Richter (1763-1825), the most imaginative and humorous of the Romantics, in his three novels, Hesperus (1795), Titan (1800-3), Flegeljahre (1804-5), confined his interest almost entirely to the exceptional, abnormal, and morbid element in life.

13. on Heine . . . Goethe's mantle fell: but with Goethe the 'liberation' is ethical, individual, and from within; and with Heine it is political and revolutionary and never consistently even this. Heine's career,—his wit, irony, and humour—derive, not from Goethe or the German Romantics, but from the Jewish element in his ancestry, tempered by French influences.

22. twenty years ago: this would be fairly correct if Arnold has in mind the collected Miscellaneous Essays, republished in 1840.

30. self-will and eccentricity: this is the constant theme of the essay on 'The Function of Criticism'; cf. note to p. 9, 10.

37. would hardly have admitted: in a letter to Moser, July 1825, Heine wrote of Goethe, 'He is essentially a man of the world; I, on the contrary, am essentially an enthusiast, i. e. inspired by the Idea and ready to sacrifice myself for it. It is a question whether the enthusiast who sacrifices his life for the Idea does not in a single moment live more, aye, live happier, than Herr von Goethe in the whole of his 76 years of comfortable egotism.'

39. the vulgar German liberals: the members of the 'Young Germany' Movement, as, for example, Börne, who wrote of Goethe in his Briefe aus Paris, 'No drier or more lifeless soul exists in the whole world, and nothing can be more comical than the simplicity with which he lays bare his own callousness'; and Menzel, who declared that Goethe's gift was not genius but talent, and attacked him in the Deutsche Litteratur (1819) for his 'three kinds of personal vanity and six kinds of voluptuousness'.

40. 'The wind of the Paris Revolution': 'Schlusswort' to the Reisebilder, vol. ii. 424.

41. the three days: the July Revolution of 1830 broke out on July 27, and ended, after a fierce conflict in the streets of Paris, on the 29th with the abdication of Charles X, who fled to England, and the appointment of Louis-Philippe, Duke of Orleans, as Lieutenant général du Royaume, and shortly afterwards as 'King of the French' under a new charter.

PAGE 118. 2. a German throne or two: the Duke of Braunschweig was forced to abdicate, constitutional changes were introduced in Saxony, Hessen-Kassel, and Altenburg, and a new political code was promulgated in Hanover.

10. beautifully objective: cf. p. 134, 36.

12. and minister: in July 1776, Karl August, Duke of Weimar, appointed Goethe Geheimer Legationsrath with a seat and voice in the Privy Council; in 1779 Goethe accepted direction of the War Department; in 1782 he was appointed provisionally Minister of Finance, and from 1791 to 1817 he was Director of the Weimar Theatre.

15. 'If I were to say': this and the passage quoted by Arnold on the next page are from a fragment found amongst Goethe's papers in Eckermann's handwriting, written in 1828. The text will be found in vol. xxxii, p. 458, of the Cotta edition of Goethe's Werke, 1840.

30. the new wine: a reference to Matthew ix. 17.

PAGE 119. 32. poetry is simply: cf. 'Maurice de Guérin', p. 64, 29.

PAGE 120. 8. born at Hamburg: Heine was born—he tells us so himself in the Reisebilder—at Düsseldorf, December 13, 1797, in the Bölkerstrasse.

11. the rights of citizenship: civil and political equality with the rest of French citizens was accorded to the Jews through Mirabeau in 1791; in 1806 Napoleon caused the Jewish Sanhedrin to be again convoked in France.

12. in the Rhine provinces: the Confédération du Rhin, which came into being after Austerlitz, in 1806, upon the dissolution of the old German Empire, united the southern German states in an offensive and defensive alliance with France under the Protection of Napoleon, at the same time assuring to each state its full sovereignty. With the disaster of Leipzig (1813) the Confederation came to an end.

29. the term épicier: this usage of the word, originally employed, as by Boileau, in depreciation of inferior, commonplace writing (cf. epigrams of Martial and Catullus on poems fit only for wrapping up spices and grocer's wares) fell into complete abeyance soon after the Revolution of 1848.

37. 'respectability with its thousand gigs': at the trial of Thurtell for the murder of Mr. Weare, in 1823, a witness who had described the deceased as 'a very respectable man' explained his epithet by saying that he 'kept a gig'. This standard of respectability not unnaturally roused some mirth, and Carlyle never wearied of pouring scorn on the phrase and all that it implied; 'gigmanity,' with a number of similar derivatives, was his name for that large section of the English middle classes who look on respectability as salvation. Arnold was perhaps thinking of a sentence in Carlyle's Count Cagliostro, 'What in the Devil's name is the use of Respectability, with never so many gigs and silver spoons, if thou inwardly art the pitifulest of all men?'

PAGE 121. 20. 'the French': Englische Fragmente, 'Die Befreiung'; vol. iii, 185.

31. 'I might settle': Romancero, poem 'Jetzt wohin?'

PAGE 122. 16. Land of Promise: cf. Hebrews xi. 9.

33. six fingers: an allusion to 1 Chronicles xx. 6.

34. the staff of whose spear: 1 Samuel xvii. 7.

37. 'While I translate': Englische Fragmente, 'Die Schuld,' vol. iii, 92.

38. 'as I saw him': Heine was in England from the end of April until the beginning of August 1827, and stayed at 32 Craven Street, Strand.

39. 'the Crown and Anchor Tavern': a famous hostelry in Arundel Street, Strand, patronized at various times by Dr. Johnson, Henry Brougham, Daniel O'Connell, and Cobbett, amongst other famous men.

PAGE 123. 10. 'England's dog!': There is a particular point in this address, since Cobbett, in his Weekly Register, May 22, 1802, speaking of the abolition of the baiting of bulls with dogs, had protested against 'the extirpation of a race of animals [bull-dogs] which are peculiar to this island and peculiarly characteristic of its people'.

17. There is balm: a reference to Jeremiah viii. 22.

24. Herr von Bismarck: Otto Eduard Leopold von Bismarck, Duke of Lauenburg (1815-98), creator of German unity, became Minister-President and Foreign Minister in 1862.

27. 'moving altogether': I cannot trace this quotation.

40. 'What demon drove me': Denkschrift an Börne, vol. xii, 55.

41. to edit a newspaper: this was the Politische Annalen in Munich, where Heine stayed from November 1827 to July 1828.

PAGE 124. 2. Hodge: in German 'Michel'.

15. 'The Emperor Charles': this was changed, correctly, in the French translation of the Reisebilder, of which this passage forms the conclusion, to 'The Emperor Maximilian'. The incident here related occurred during the unsuccessful war waged by Maximilian I (1459-1519) against the Swiss Confederacy in 1497. Charles V (1500-58) was the grandson of Maximilian.

19. 'Holbein has painted him': the portrait which Heine has in mind is that by Titian in the Munich Pinakothek; there is no portrait of him by Holbein.

27. Conrad von der Rosen: Kunz von der Rosen was the favourite fool of Maximilian I. Various anecdotes about him are to be found in Flögel's Geschichte der Hof-Narren.

PAGE 125. 2. 'Tel est notre plaisir': 'Our pleasure is'—the ordinary formula of royal proclamations issued from the French Chancellery.

PAGE 126. 10. published in America: at Philadelphia, 1857-9; the German edition referred to in the footnote is that by Strodtmann (author of Heine's Leben und Werke, 1867), published at Hamburg, 1861-84.

12. first important work: the Reisebilder appeared in four volumes at intervals from 1826 to 1831, and by 1852 it had reached its tenth edition; but in 1827 Heine's reputation had already been made by the publication of the Buch der Lieder at Hamburg, an event which aroused the greatest excitement and enthusiasm.

37. 'Pouvez-vous siffler': this and the following anecdotes will be found in Strodtmann's Life of Heine and in the Souvenirs de la Vie Intime de H. Heine, by Princesse della Rocca.

PAGE 127. 2. M. Scribe: Augustin Eugène Scribe (1791-1861), French dramatist, author of many famous plays, unrivalled for theatrical ability and dramatic construction.

30. 'It is all of no use': this remark is quoted by Adolf Stahr, who visited Heine in October 1855, and describes the visit in his book, Nach Fünf Jahren (1857).

32. the Communists: Communism is the name given to any theory of society in which private ownership of the means of wealth is abolished and vested in the community. The French Communists alluded to here were the political party who followed Guizot and Fourier, and have no connexion with the Paris Commune of 1870.

PAGE 128. 18. Goerres: Jacob Joseph von Görres (1776-1848), professor of history in the University of Munich, and author of the well-known book on Die Christliche Mystik.

Brentano or Arnim: Clemens Brentano (1778-1842) and Ludwig Joachim von Arnim (1781-1831) together published the famous collection of popular German ballads and songs, entitled Des Knaben Wunderhorn, in 1806, and supplemented it with two more volumes in 1808.

25. A French critic of Heine: no trace of this criticism is to be found in Betz's exhaustive monograph, Heine in Frankreich (1895); it most probably appeared in a French journal about the time of Heine's death in 1856.

40. 'When Candide': Reisebilder, 'Bäder von Lucca', vol. ii, 255. Candide ou l'Optimisme, perhaps the best-known of Voltaire's works, was published in 1759 as a satire upon the optimism of Leibnitz, and was called forth by the great earthquake of Lisbon three years previously. The reference is to chapter xvii.

PAGE 129. 13. as he calls himself: Briefe über die Juli-Revolution, vol. xii, 88.

'Initiator': Über Deutschland, vol. v, 257.

PAGE 130. 14. He enlargeth a nation : Job xii. 23.

PAGE 131. 14. stat magni : 'there stands the shadow of a great name', Lucan, Pharsalia, i. 135.

27. to affront and wound : in Germany Heine has always been looked upon and judged as the stinging-nettle in the garden of literature ; in histories of literature his prose is described as old-fashioned and his verse as artificial. On the other hand the French critic Edmond de Goncourt said of Heine that 'all modern French writers compared with him reminded him of commercial travellers', and Gautier, criticizing the French edition of the Reisebilder, exclaimed that Heine's 'sarcasms wore the brocaded garments of a court-fool adorned with gold and pearls and shells ; cut off the shells and the dress might serve the Laureate Apollo for a festal robe'.

33. story of the French abbé : Ideen : Buch le Grand, vol. i, 242.

PAGE 132. 4. Professor Saalfeld : Friedrich Saalfeld (1785-1834), author of a History of Napoleon (1815), and other compilations, was accused of participation in the liberal revolutionary movement of 1831 and forced to leave the University of Göttingen, where he was a Professor of Philosophy.

8. 'It is curious' : Ideen : Buch le Grand, vol. i, 255.

9. Castlereagh : Robert Stewart, Viscount Castlereagh and second Marquis of Londonderry (1769-1822), represented Great Britain at the Congress of Vienna, and was responsible for the choice of St. Helena as Napoleon's place of exile.

10. Louis the Eighteenth : the younger brother of Louis XVI ascended the throne on the fall of Napoleon in 1814, was expelled by him in 1815, but restored by the allied armies in June 1815, and occupied the throne until his death in 1824.

14. 'The Englishman' : Englische Fragmente : 'Auf der Themse.'

26. the Palais Royal : from the close of the eighteenth century the gardens of the Palais-Royal (built by Richelieu in 1629 and presented by him to Louis XIII) were notorious as the resort of courtesans.

PAGE 133. 3. 'Ah ! que me dites-vous' : M. Legouis, in his Défense de la Poésie Française (1912), remarks upon this passage, 'he (Arnold) chooses two French Alexandrine verses, not famous, not popular. I confess that I have never known them quoted, except by him, and that I am ignorant of their origin, although the antithesis and the artificial balance of the two hemistichs suggest Victor Hugo in one of his least happily inspired moments.' For Arnold's capricious dislike of the Alexandrine, and of French poetry in general, cf. 'Maurice de Guérin', p. 66, 14 sqq.

6. 'Take, oh, take' : Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, IV. i.

9. 'Siehst sehr sterbeblässlich aus' : Romancero : 'Lamentationen,' vol. xviii, 162. Arnold translates the distich, p. 140, 20.

28. a sort of Gretchen : Margarethe in Goethe's Faust : Heine's verses were doubtless suggested by the catechizing scene in Goethe's poem.

33. 'Ah, my child': Aus der Harzreise: 'Berg-Idylle,' vol. i, 60.

PAGE 134. 26. his Romancero: this volume, divided into 'Histories', 'Lamentations', and 'Hebrew Melodies', was written in 1850-1.

30. Matrazzen-gruft: 'Nachwort zum Romancero', vol. xviii, 6. Arnold quotes the whole passage on p. 140, 27.

32. Rhampsinitus: Heine's poem is based on the story told by Herodotus (ii. 121) of the theft of the king's treasure, his daughter's attempt to entrap the thief, and the thief's subsequent pardon. Frazer says the tale is a piece of early folklore, and mentions twenty-eight versions of it. Commentary on Pausanias, ix. 37.

Edith with the Swan Neck: the mistress of Harold, King of England, who was slain at the Battle of Hastings, 1066. In early lives of Harold it is related—and this is the subject of Heine's poem, 'Die Schlacht zu Hastings'—that, owing to the difficulty in identifying the king's corpse, Edith 'cognomento Swannenhals' alone was able to recognize it by certain marks on the body.

33. Charles the First: i.e. of England. Heine represents the king meditating upon his downfall in a charcoal-burner's hut after one of the disastrous battles of the Civil War.

Marie Antoinette: she was married to Louis XVI (then Dauphin) in 1770, and guillotined during the Terror, October 16, 1793. Heine's poem describes a ghostly 'lever' of the decapitated queen at the Tuileries.

King David: the poem is based upon 1 Kings ii. 5, where David on his deathbed urges Solomon to put Joab to death.

a heroine of Mabilie: Pomaré, one of the best-known figures of Heine's day at the Jardin Mabilie, where every night public dances took place. The 'bal Mabilie' was instituted in 1840, and Pomaré was one of the earliest of a long series of 'Queens of Mabilie'.

34. Melisanda of Tripoli: according to a twelfth-century troubadour tradition, Geoffroy Rudel, baron of Blaye, for his great love of Melisande, Princess of Tripoli, set sail from France, and on reaching the shore of Tripoli died at her feet. Petrarch alludes to the story when he speaks of

Gianfre Rudel che usò la vela e il remo
A cercar la sua morte.

Richard Cœur de Lion: the poem describes the joy of Richard I at seeing once more the forest glades of England after his long imprisonment in Austria.

35. Pedro the Cruel: Pedro, King of Castile and Leon (1334-69), with the aid of the Black Prince, defeated his half-brother, Henry of Trastamare, at Navarrete in 1367, but was himself defeated and put to death by Henry at Montiel.

Firdusi: Abul Kasim Mansur, the great epic poet of Persia—called Firdusi from Firdaus, 'Paradise'—(? 940–1020), was the author of the Shah Namah, an epic of 60,000 distichs, relating the deeds of Iranian and Persian sovereigns and heroes down to the fall of the Sasanidae (A.D. 636).

Cortes: Hernando Cortes (1485–1547), the famous Spanish general and conqueror of Mexico. Heine's poem, entitled 'Vitzliputzli', from the name of the Mexican war-god, is a long and triumphant description of the vengeance taken by the Mexicans for the murder of their king, though they were afterwards completely vanquished.

Dr. Döllinger: Ignaz Döllinger (1799–1890), leader of the Old Catholic Movement in opposition to the Decrees of the Vatican Council (1869–70).‡ The poem, 'Der Ex-Nachtwächter', is an appeal to Döllinger to join the company of Erasmus, von Hutten, and other humanists in the age-long campaign against obscurantist monasticism.

36. hübsch objectiv: from the paragraph quoted on p. 118, 10: Arnold misrepresents the correct meaning of the phrase.

PAGE 135. 1. Spanish Atridae: the poem belongs to the second book of the Romancero, 'Lamentationen', vol. xviii, 113.

2. Segovia: the capital of the province of that name in Old Castile, and the residence of the kings of Leon and Castile.

41. Ceres . . . Proserpine: Ceres, an early Italian goddess of culture (cresco, creare), was later identified with Demeter, the Greek goddess of seed and harvest, and the mother of Proserpine, who was carried off by Pluto.

PAGE 136. 2. garbanzos: the common chick-pea, from which is made a kind of pulse much esteemed in Spain.

32. he has excellently pointed out: the reference appears to be to the earlier chapters of Heine's book, Über Deutschland, but an equally good illustration is to be found in the second and third books of the Romancero.

PAGE 137. 1. 'longing which cannot be uttered': perhaps an echo of Romans viii. 26, 'with groanings which cannot be uttered'.

4. 'There lives': Reisebilder, 'Die Bäder von Lucca', c. ix.

5. Moses Lump: 'Lump' in German means not only a 'tatter' or 'rag' but also a 'ragamuffin'.

8. on Friday evening: the Jewish Sabbath lasts from sunset on Friday to Saturday evening.

20. Antiochus: Antiochus IV, Epiphanes, King of Syria (175–164 B. C.), took Jerusalem by storm and desecrated the Temple, 170 B. C.

Titus: Titus Sabinus Vespasianus (A.D. 40–81, emperor from A.D. 79), son of the Emperor Vespasian, was left by him to continue the Jewish War, and took Jerusalem by storm, A.D. 70.

25. Diogenes: Diogenes (412–323 B. C.), Greek cynic philosopher, born at Sinope, and pupil of Antisthenes at Athens, is said by Diog. Laertius to have inured himself to vicissitudes of weather by living in a tub outside the temple of Cybele at Athens.

29. Rothschild the Great: the banking house of Rothschild, so named from the sign of the house, 'zum Rothen Schilde', in Frankfurt, was founded in the latter half of the eighteenth century by Meyer Anselm Rothschild, who died in 1812, leaving five sons, all of whom were created barons of the Austrian empire in 1822. The eldest of these sons, Anselm (1773-1855), is the one to whom Heine here refers.

37. 'If I were not': Alexander the Great, after a meeting with Diogenes, is said to have exclaimed, 'If I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes.'

39. Princess Sabbath: Romancero, 'Lamentationen', vol. xviii, 189.

PAGE 138. 1. the Queen of Sheba: her visit to Solomon is related in 1 Kings x, 2 Chronicles ix. Saba is in S.W. Arabia, not in Aethiopia, and was famous for its export trade in spices, jewels, and gold.

20. Jehuda ben Halevy: this fragmentary poem belongs to the third book of the Romancero, 'Hebräische Melodien'; vol. xviii, p. 195. Juda Ha-Levi (1085-1140) was a Spanish philosopher and Hebrew poet. The story of his death at Jerusalem, as related by Heine, may be historical.

the great golden age, &c.: the source of this quotation is untraced.

25. Laura: on Good Friday, April 6, 1327, Petrarch for the first time saw Laura, daughter of Audibert de Noves and wife of Hugh de Sale, in the church of St. Clare at Avignon.

31. the Gay Science: this is Arnold's paraphrase of Heine's directly expressive 'Kussrechtskasuistin'.

41. the wide-famed Lament: the so-called 'Letzte Zionide' of Ha-Levi, an elegy inspired by the first sight of the Holy City.

PAGE 139. 3. Ab: the fifth month of the Hebrew year, originally a Babylonian word, adopted by the Jews after the return from Babylonian exile. Jerusalem was captured after a siege of 134 days, on September 4, A. D. 70.

27. a public dispute: such disputations were not uncommon in earlier times—e. g. in 1263 at Barcelona and at the French Court in 1240—but are an anachronism in the time of Don Pedro, and in the poetic, philosophical court of Toledo, where the Jews enjoyed great power. This poem likewise belongs to the 'Hebräische Melodien'. Arnold omits to mention the conclusion of the poem, which reveals Heine's own thought of the matter, and is best given in the original German:

Doch es will mir schier bedünken,
Dass der Rabbi und der Mönch—
Dass sie alle beide stinken.

PAGE 140. 14. 'Thou tookest': Romancero, 'Lamentationen.' The poem bears the title 'Sterbende'.

27. 'Can it be': 'Nachwort' to Romancero, written September 30, 1851, vol. xviii, 6.

PAGE 141. 12. Goethe says: in his Conversations with Goethe Eckermann writes (last paragraph): 'One of our most modern poets who had lately gained a great name and whose negative tendency was likewise disapproved,' was mentioned by Goethe, who remarked, 'I cannot deny his great talent. He will be feared, and will be the idol of those who would like to be as negative as himself but have not his talent. To me he seems to be deficient in love.' But it is seriously disputed whether the poet in question is Heine.

PAGE 142. 8. Many are called: Matthew xxii. 14.

PAGAN AND MEDIAEVAL RELIGIOUS SENTIMENT

This essay was delivered as a lecture at Oxford and appeared in the Cornhill Magazine, 1864.

PAGE 143. 1. I read the other day: the quotation is from an article on 'The Catholic Congress of Malines' in the Dublin Review, October, 1863.

33. Mr. Spurgeon: Charles Haddon Spurgeon (1834-92) was a Baptist minister of strict Calvinistic beliefs, whose sermons at Exeter Hall attracted such large audiences that the Metropolitan Tabernacle, holding six thousand people, was built to accommodate his hearers.

Caliph Omar: Omar, the second of the Mohammedan Caliphs (581-644), defeated the Persians and brought Iran under Arab rule. He destroyed the library of Alexandria, containing 700,000 volumes collected by the Ptolemies, so far as it remained after being pillaged by the Christians under Theophilus (389). Omar declared that if the books in the Library contained the truth, it was already to be found in the Koran; and if they were contrary to the Koran they deserved destruction.

PAGE 144. 2. the collection of the Abbé Migne: Jacques Paul Migne (1800-75) published his Scripturae sacrae cursus completus in 28 vols.; Theologiae cursus in 28 vols.; Collection des orateurs sacrés in 100 vols.; Patrologiae cursus completus in 383 vols.; Encyclopédie théologique in 171 vols.

7. the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology: a series of reprints of the works of the more famous Church of England divines, published under Tractarian influence (1840-50).

9. Calvin: John Calvin (1509-64), Protestant reformer and theologian, born in Picardy, joined the reforming movement in 1528, was banished from Paris in 1533, living subsequently in Switzerland, where at Basle he published his famous Institutes in 1536, and founded the Academy of Geneva in 1559. His principal tenet was an exaggerated doctrine of predestination.

10. Dr. Chalmers: Thomas Chalmers (1780-1847), Scottish theologian and pioneer of the movement which led to the disruption of the Scottish national church and the formation of the Free Church in 1843, was Principal and Divinity Professor at the Free Church College, Edinburgh, and Professor of Moral Philosophy at St. Andrews (1823-8). His writings fill more than thirty volumes.

13. Dr. Channing: William Ellery Channing (1780-1842), American minister, writer, and philanthropist, was one of the chief founders of American Unitarianism, and Pastor of Federal Street Church, Boston. His works consist of discourses, reviews, and miscellanies on ethical and literary subjects.

22. Acta Sanctorum: this, the greatest hagiographical work in existence, generally known as the Bollandist Lives of the Saints, was begun by Heribert Rosweyde, of the Society of Jesus, in 1607; when the Jesuits were expelled from Belgium in 1773 the Bollandists were allowed to remain at their work till 1786. In 1837, at the suggestion of the Académie Royale of Belgium, the work was again begun, and is still proceeding in the Bulletin des publications hagiographiques (1892).

23. the Law Digest: a London periodical publication that began to appear half-yearly in 1846, forming a general index to law reports and statutes.

30. the net in Scripture: Matthew xiii. 47.

PAGE 145. 6. Dr. Candlish: Robert Smith Candlish (1806-73), Free Church divine and leader, became Principal of Free Church College, Edinburgh, in 1862.

the Duke of Argyll: George Douglas Campbell, eighth Duke (1823-1900), prominent Whig politician, became famous for his writings on the struggle in the Scottish national church (1842-8); he was a geologist of some repute in his day.

13. Quicquid agunt homines: 'all human interests'; Juvenal, Satires, i. 85.

19. Dictionnaire des Apocryphes: this and the other Dictionnaires to which Arnold here alludes are volumes of the Encyclopédie théologique.

29. 'The religious persecutions': a quotation from the article on Anglicanisme.

PAGE 146. 8. There I found: the instances given by Migne are taken from Greek and Latin writers, and in each case he gives his authority; if 'the colours are laid on very thick' they are not thicker than those of Juvenal, Suetonius, or Petronius, for example.

12. Galen's mother: Claudius Galenus, a native of Pergamus in Mysia, was born about A.D. 131, and was still living in the reign of Septimius Severus (A.D. 193-211). He is the most famous physician of antiquity; after studying at Alexandria and elsewhere he arrived in Rome about 163-4, and subsequently became physician to the Emperor Commodus. He wrote on almost every branch of medical science, and it is he who relates the cruel temper of his mother and her quarrels with her husband.

35. Marcus Aurelius's mother: see below, p. 225, 35 and note.

39. Aventine: the southernmost of the Seven Hills of Rome; under the Empire it became the home of a motley crowd (the plebs urbana) comprising respectable artisans, small tradesmen, and ruined peasants from the country, and a miscellaneous rabble (the plebs quae frumentum accipiat) attracted by the distributions of grain and the public shows.

PAGE 147. 1. the rural population: in consequence of the enclosure of public lands at the end of the eighteenth century, the loss of grazing rights, the superseding of domestic industries by manufactured goods, and the mischievous administration of the Poor Law, the agricultural population of England fell into great distress. The wages of agricultural labourers in 1846 averaged only 9s. 6d. a week in the southern counties.

15. Theocritus's idylls: Theocritus, a native of Syracuse, was born about 315 B.C. The place and year of his death are uncertain. Thirty Idylls and twenty-three Epigrams are extant, besides many spurious pieces.

26. the feast of Adonis: Adonis is certainly not the sun (for arguments against this solar interpretation see Baudissin, Adonis und Esmun, pp. 169 sqq.), but represents the annual death and revival of vegetation. This is also the view of the Scholiast on Theocritus, iii. 98, of Origen, Jerome, and Ammianus Marcellinus. His cultus arose in South Babylonia, where he was worshipped as the youthful lover of Ishtar.

PAGE 149. 18. the royal Horse Guards: this is a mistranslation. Πτολεμιστὰι ἵπποι are 'the king's chargers', which were led, not ridden, as is also shown by τὸν ἄγοντα, 'the man that's leading him', translated by Arnold 'the man on his back'.

PAGE 150. 22. patroness of needlewomen: that is, Athena, the patroness of all useful and elegant arts. In Homer all products of women's labour are called 'works of Athena', and many statues of the goddess represent her holding a spindle and distaff.

33. their broad lingo: broad vowels were characteristic of the Dorian dialect.

38. originally from Corinth: Syracuse was founded by Corinthian emigrants under Archias before the end of the eighth century B.C.

as Bellerophon did: Bellerophon was son of the Corinthian king Glaucus and grandson of Sisyphus. Mounted on the winged horse Pegasus, he slew the Chimaera.

41. honey-sweet Proserpine: the priestesses of Persephone were called μέλισσαι, 'bees'.

PAGE 151. 14. Sophron: Theocritus is believed to have had a model for this Idyll in the Isthmiazusae of Sophron, in which two women described the spectacle of the Isthmian games. The Mimes of Sophron of Syracuse (460-420 B. C.) were ethical compositions, describing not only incident but character.

19. Greek poetry of the decadence: nothing could be less Hellenic than most of the literature of the Alexandrian age, Oriental in fashion and in religion, devoid of virility and interest in human life, the self-conscious productions of 'literary' librarians.

22. Golgi: the sanctuary of Aphrodite at Golgi was older even than that of Paphos. Cf. Pausanias viii. 5. 2. Conical stones which served as idols of the goddess in primitive times have been found there.

Idalium: a town and promontory on the coast of Cyprus sacred to Aphrodite.

23. Eryx: a sanctuary 41 miles west of Palermo, now known as Monte San Giuliano.

26. Acheron: a river of the underworld, 'river of woe' (ὁ ἄχαι ρέων).

28. Dione's child: Dione, a female Titan, daughter of Oceanus, and Tethys, and mother by Zeus of Aphrodite.

29. Berenice: wife of Ptolemy I and mother of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Arsinoe.

41. all winged and creeping things: i. e. cakes made in these shapes.

PAGE 152. 4. the eagle: this should be 'the two eagles' (αἰετώ).

8. Miletus in the north-west of Asia Minor was celebrated for its woollen cloths and carpets.

20. moonstruck: this is a mistranslation of βαρυσάνιος, 'heavy in wrath'.

PAGE 153. 8. Adonis was the sun: this is untrue; see note to p. 147, 26.

16. 'Hope, and a renovation': Wordsworth, 'Address to my infant daughter Dora, September 16, 1804', published 1815.

26. Kyrie eleison: a Latin transliteration of the Greek Κύριε ἐλέησον ('Lord have mercy upon us'). Arnold's view seems hardly compatible with the scenes that are witnessed in the churches of Southern Europe on the occasion of any 'joyful or mundane matter'. Writers on Comparative Religion have collected innumerable instances of the survival of pagan customs and cults in Christian usage and popular worship.

30. Goethe's Wilhelm Meister: this work appeared at intervals from 1778 to 1796 with a sequel in 1821; the first half is entitled

Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre or Apprenticeship, the second half Wilhelm Meister's Wanderjahre or Travels. The book is not a novel in the ordinary sense; it embraces 'hints or disquisitions on almost every leading point in life and literature', and the characters in it represent every variety of human nature.

39. Pompeii and Herculaneum: Pompeii had already been partly destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius in A. D. 63 (Tacitus, Annals, xv. 22), when a second eruption in A. D. 79 completely buried it and the neighbouring municipium of Herculaneum which lay between it and Naples.

PAGE 154. 13. Antichrist is first mentioned in the first Epistle of John (ii. 18), from which it is clear that there was a general belief that Antichrist would appear before Christ's second coming. From passages in the Book of Daniel and the Apocalypse the early and mediaeval church were led to expect his speedy advent, though whether he would be a phantom devil, a demon incarnate, or merely a desperately wicked man was a matter of controversy. Nero, Diocletian, the Emperor Julian, Mahomet, and even the Pope, have all in turn been deemed Antichrist by their opponents; and Christendom has periodically witnessed a recrudescence of the belief in his speedy appearance. One such occurred in the thirteenth century, largely through the predictions of Joachim, abbot of Floris in southern Italy, who fixed the date with great exactness for 1260, rather more than half a century after his own death. There is a most interesting article on Antichrist in Baring-Gould's Curious Myths of the Middle Ages.

16. St. Francis: Francis Bernadone (1182-1226) of Assisi in early youth was 'very joyous', writes his oldest biographer, Thomas of Celano: but the miseries of the poor, the lepers, the dangerous pilgrims and thieves who infested the towns and highways saddened his pleasures, and drawing round him a small band of companions he journeyed with them to Rome and laid before Innocent III the outline of his first Rule of Life for a community devoted to the service of the poor (1210).

24. the most popular body of ministers of religion: the Friars Minor, as the Franciscans are called, to distinguish them from the Dominicans, or Preaching Friars, who were founded a few years earlier.

35. it was said of him: I have not found the reference.

41. two disciples: Bernard of Quintavalle and Peter of Cataneo.

PAGE 155. 1. (and he died at forty-four): in the night of October 3, 1226.

9. he made poetry: St. Francis taught a people accustomed to the artificial versification of courtly Latin and Provençal poets the use of their native tongue in simple spontaneous hymns. He may be said also to have revived the drama through the mystery-play of the Crib of Bethlehem which he originated.

13. the court of kings: during the Albigensian wars many French troubadours took refuge at Frederick II's court in Sicily; the emperor himself, his sons, and his great chancellor, all wrote and sang Provençal songs.

19. Canticle of the Sun: this was composed in September, 1225, in a little hut of reeds made for St. Francis at St. Damian's. There is no evidence for the assertion that it was designed for popular use.

PAGE 156. 39. Monte Alverno: two years before his death St. Francis ascended Mt. Alverno in the Apennines with some of his disciples, and after forty days' fasting received there on September 14, 1224, the impress of the Five Wounds. Cf. account given in St. Bonaventura's Life, c. 8.

PAGE 157. 23. more akin to St. Francis: there is far more of Theocritus in St. Francis than there is of St. Francis in Luther. It would be difficult to conceive a greater fundamental dissimilarity than that between Luther with his passionate violence, his irreproducible coarseness and pathological states, and St. Francis, the 'minstrel of the Lord', inspired by the chansons de geste, full of tenderness and God's courtesy. Monte Alverno is nearer to Syracuse than to Wittenberg, and the stigmata are not so alien from the dying Adonis as is Justification by Faith.

38. of whom I have already spoken: Heinrich Heine, in the previous essay.

41. in his very last poem: Die Passionsblume.

PAGE 158. 7. 'All through the Middle Age': quoted from Der Salon, ii, 'On the History of Religion and Philosophy in Germany', vol. v, 41.

39. 'What pipes and timbrels!' Keats, 'Ode on a Grecian Urn', 10.

PAGE 159. 12. 'The great pot': Geständnisse: vol. xiv, 328 (1854).

18. 'Shiraz': the capital of Farsistan in Persia, famous as the home of Hafiz and Sadi and the seat of Persian culture in the Middle Ages.

24. Aristophanes: the greatest of the Greek comic poets. His earliest play, The Banqueters, was produced in 427 B. C.

30. 'In the year 1340': Geständnisse, last paragraphs.

'the Chronicle of Limburg': Limburg-on-the-Lahn, in the province of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, 21 miles east of Coblenz, is famed for its thirteenth-century Cathedral and Chronicle.

PAGE 160. 12. the indeterminate grotesques: 'with the building of the cathedrals originated a new style of art; a strange mixture of memories of paganism and Christian imaginings . . . often obscene and horrible, often quaint and fantastic.'

PAGE 161. 37. Simonides: perhaps the greatest of Greek lyric poets, for strength and sweetness, a native of Ceos in the Cyclades and contemporary of Pindar. He died at Syracuse in 469 or 467 B. C.

PAGE 162. 6. 'the heavy and the weary weight': Wordsworth, Lines composed a few miles above Tintern Abbey, July 13, 1798.

22. 'Oh! that my lot': Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus, 863 sqq.

29. Let St. Francis: the harshness of this ending to the essay has been noticed frequently by critics as being hardly 'prose of the centre'.

JOUBERT

This essay first appeared in the National Review for January, 1864, under the title 'Joubert; or, a French Coleridge'.

References to Joubert's works in these notes are from the edition by Paul de Raynal, in two volumes, Paris, 1888.

PAGE 164. 4. M. Sainte-Beuve: see note to p. 64, 28. Sainte-Beuve wrote two appreciations of Joubert, the first on the private publication of the Pensées by Mme Joubert and Chateaubriand, subsequently reprinted in Portraits littéraires, ii, p. 300; the second after the re-impression of the volume by Paul de Raynal in 1842, to be found in the Causeries du Lundi, i, p. 158.

11. Périgord: one of the old provinces of France, part of the military government of Guienne and Gascony, now represented by the department of Dordogne and part of Lot-et-Garonne.

16. by the Jesuits: this is incorrect; at this time the Collège de Toulouse was directed by the Pères de la Doctrine Chrétienne.

25. Diderot: Denis Diderot (1713-84), French mathematician, critic, and philosopher, was one of the principal contributors to the Encyclopédie (35 vols., 1751-80), which aimed at embodying all the knowledge that mankind had so far attained. In versatility of mind and felicity of expression Diderot is one of the most fertile of the thinkers of France.

D'Alembert: Jean-Baptiste le Rond d'Alembert (1717-83), French mathematician and philosopher, wrote the mathematical articles and part of the biographies in the Encyclopédie, became perpetual Secretary of the Academy in 1772, and in this capacity acted as spokesman of the parti des philosophes, of which Voltaire was the head.

26. Marmontel: Jean François Marmontel (1723-99), French writer and Encyclopaedist, the author of several tragedies, and a history of French poetry. His Éléments de Littérature, written for the Encyclopédie, still holds a place amongst French classics. He was elected to the Academy in 1763, and published his famous Mémoires d'un Père in 1804.

Laharpe: Jean François de Laharpe (1739-1803), French critic, began to write for the Mercure in 1768, and in 1786 published his Cours de Littérature ancienne et moderne; in 1776 he was received into the Academy and was regarded as the greatest critic of the French school of tragedy.

29. Fontanes: Louis, Marquis de Fontanes (1757-1821), French poet and politician. Elected to the Legislative Chamber in 1802, he became its President (1804-10), and Grand Master of the University of Paris (1808-15). Fontanes professed religious and monarchical principles, and was made marquis in 1817. Of his literary work the most important fragment is eight cantos of a poem called La Grèce Sauvée.

30. it began to be remarked: cf. Raynal, i, Preface, p. xiv.

40. Chateaubriand said of him: 's'il n'avait voulu cacher sa vie.' The phrase occurs in a note by Chateaubriand to a letter that he addressed to Joubert during his journey in Italy.

41. Epicurus's famous words: one of his favourite maxims was λάθε βιώσας, 'live unnoticed'. Plutarch, in his Morals, makes a strong attack on the precept as being suited only to those whose lives will not bear investigation. Epicurus, born 341 B. C., taught philosophy in Mitylene (310), then removed to Athens, where he died in 270. The representation of Epicurus as a sensualist, attempting to give the sanction of philosophy to a life of debauchery, is an idle calumny invented by rival philosophers; when he declares that pleasure is the only good and pain the only evil, he is searching for a principle of conduct, not for the elect few, whom Plato had in view, but for the plain average man. It is rather a permanent lifelong condition of serene happiness than the pleasure of the moment, according to Epicurus, that should be the end of individual action: his disciples, in some cases, however, perverted this doctrine.

PAGE 165. 5. the office of justice of the peace elective: by the constitution of 1791, canton and town elected one or more juges de paix to try lighter misdemeanours.

8. Plutarch's men of virtue: Arnold does not seem to be alluding to any passage or phrase in Plutarch (A. D. 46-120); his works are (a) historical, comprising forty-six parallel Lives of distinguished Greeks and Romans, of which some were composed for his own moral improvement and others to inculcate virtue by showing the opposite vice, and (b) Opera Moralia, sixty or more short treatises on ethics, politics, history, and philosophy.

21. The sage: Diogenes Laertius recounts a similar reply of Aristippus (circ. 435-356 B. C.), the founder of the Cyrenaic school of Athenian philosophy.

33. after two distinguished names: those of M. de Bonald and M. de Beausset.

PAGE 166. 17. in his own words: 'beaucoup de ciel se mêlait à peu de terre.' Raynal, Preface.

21. a complete Voltaire: cf. letter xv to Madame de Beaumont: 'Dieu me préserve d'avoir jamais en ma possession un Voltaire tout entier!'

26. Pauline de Montmorin: from 1794 to 1803, the year of her death, the salon of Madame de Beaumont was the meeting-place of Joubert, Chateaubriand, Fontanes, Molé, and Chénedollé, amongst others: many of the finest passages of Chénier were written in her cabinet, and Madame de Staël constantly invited her judgement on her own work before publishing it.

31. Benjamin Constant: Benjamin Constant de Rebecque (1767-1830) met Madame de Staël in 1794, and supplied her with her passions, emotions, and rebellious thoughts. In 1803-4 he travelled with her in Germany, and during her exile showed great political activity against Napoleon. Madame de Récamier, however, induced him to support the Empire, and under the Bourbons and Louis-Philippe he became a determined leader of the Liberal Opposition.

PAGE 167. 27. by his library: this, Raynal tells us, contained few modern works, but numerous editions of Plato, Homer, Virgil, Aristotle, and Plutarch, books of ecclesiastical history, metaphysics, travels, and fairy-tales, and countless volumes of bibliographical antiquities.

PAGE 168. 4. a short notice: in the number published May 8, 1824. Arnold quotes only the first half of Chateaubriand's sentence; it continues: 'there are, however, other memories which friendship cherishes, and it is only in order to give public expression to my regret that I make mention here of the literary talent of my friend.' This notice was reprinted by Chateaubriand in his Preface to the limited edition of 1838, and is to be found in Raynal's Preface.

38. great and celebrated talkers: cf. Hazlitt's judgement upon Coleridge's conversation: 'His talk was excellent, if you let him start from no premisses and come to no conclusion.' So too Carlyle speaks of his talk as 'not flowing anywhither like a river, but spreading everywhere in inextricable currents and regurgitations like a lake or sea . . . communicating no meaning whatsoever to any individual of his hearers'.

40. Mr. Gilman's at Highgate: with whom Coleridge lived from 1816 till his death in 1834.

PAGE 170. 15. M. de Rémusat reproaches Coleridge: in the Revue des Deux Mondes, October 1, 1856, in an article on 'Religious Controversies in England: Coleridge and Arnold'. It is a little remarkable for an essayist to quote from articles in magazines ten years old, but this is explained by Arnold's exaggerated opinion of the journal in question; see above, p. 21, 35.

Charles François Marie, Comte de Rémusat (1797-1875), Minister for Foreign Affairs in 1871, published several books dealing with English history, specially of the eighteenth century, and a study of John Wesley.

16. saugrenus: a word derived from 'sel' and 'grenu', and almost equivalent to the English 'preposterous'.

24. Goethe's complaint: in Remarks on Rameau's Nephew, Works, vol. xxxiii (Stuttgart, 1871), where Goethe says that the Bench only speaks of Du Bartas with contempt, and adds his own opinion that the first forty verses of the Seventh Day of Creation should find a place in every French Anthology. Sainte-Beuve quotes Goethe in the Tableau article on Du Bartas.

25. Du Bartas: Guillaume de Saluste du Bartas, the 'Protestant Ronsard', was born in 1544, served Henry of Navarre in war and diplomacy, and died of wounds received at Ivry in 1590. His chief work was La Sepmaine, a poem on the creation of the world, which enjoyed an extraordinary popularity and ran through thirty editions in six years. It was translated by Joshua Sylvester into English in 1598, and served to inspire Milton and Fletcher with several ideas and expressions; it is frequently quoted by Isaac Walton, who, in accordance with the prevalent custom, speaks of the author as 'divine Du Bartas'. The modern reader will find the work not unamusing, its tedium being relieved by flashes of unconscious humour, and an occasional grandeur of expression.

39. the Abbé Delille: Jacques Delille (1738-1813). His principal work, Les Jardins, appeared in 1783, the translation of Milton's Paradise Lost in 1805. Joubert refers to this in a letter to M. Molé, January 9, 1805. 'The verses of Milton', he says, 'are made of steel, but Delille has made them of pure silver.'

PAGE 171. 5. apicibus verborum ligata, 'bound to the top-strokes of his words'. The phrase is quoted by Sainte-Beuve, without reference to Quintilian, in a note in the first volume of his work Chateaubriand et son groupe littéraire. The Latin phrase does not appear to come from Quintilian.

14. René: this work appeared in 1802, and is an idealized portrait of the author himself. It belongs to the same class of book as Goethe's Werther and Senancour's Obermann; its immediate literary precursors were Rousseau and Ossian.

16. Childe Harold or Manfred: the first two cantos of Childe Harold appeared in 1812, and reached a fifth edition the same year. The third canto was published in 1816, and the fourth in 1818. Manfred, a Dramatic Poem, appeared in 1817.

19. this criticism: the quotation is from the Preface to Chateaubriand's Atala. Lamartine holds the contrary view: he declares that 'the sublime is wearisome and the beautiful is deceptive, but he who knows how to touch the heart knows all. There is more genius in one tear than in all the museums and libraries in the world.'

28. when Priam says to Achilles: Iliad xxiv. 505.

32. when Joseph cries out: Genesis xlv. 4.

36. take these words: 'My God, my God, when, oh when, shall I be delivered from all this world, this din; when, oh when, shall all this come to an end?'

Chateaubriand died July 4, 1848; the February revolution forced Louis-Philippe to abdicate, and in September Louis Napoleon was proclaimed President of the Republic.

PAGE 172. 3. most ignorantly underrated: Macaulay, for instance, spoke of him thus: 'He was simply a great humbug. I was astonished at the utter worthlessness of the book (the Génie du Christianisme) both in matter and manner.' Trevelyan, Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay.

13. Molière: Jean-Baptiste Poquelin, afterwards called Molière (1622-73), the greatest of French writers of comedy, wrote the Précieuses ridicules, the first of his really great works, in 1659, and from that date until the production of Le Malade imaginaire, in the year of his death, combined, as no one else has done, the power of raising audacious farce into the region of pure comedy and the power of satirizing social abuses with a pitiless good-humour.

25. M. Molé: Louis Mathieu Molé (1781-1855) became known to Napoleon through his Essais de Morale et de Politique. In 1813 he became Minister of Justice, and under Louis-Philippe Minister for Foreign Affairs; he was elected to the Academy in 1848.

27. 'As to your Milton': Letter LII to M. Molé, February 18, 1805.

34. the younger Racine: Louis Racine (1692-1763), second son of the great dramatist, brought out a prose translation of Paradise Lost in 1755.

PAGE 173. 21. Jeffrey: Francis, Lord Jeffrey (1773-1850), Scottish critic, essayist, and jurist, and a founder of the Edinburgh Review (see note to p. 21, 39). Coleridge accused Jeffrey of partiality and insincerity in his criticism of Wordsworth, in a letter dated May 23, 1808, and made a further attack upon him in the Biographia Literaria, c. xxi; to this Jeffrey replied convincingly in the Edinburgh Review, August, 1817.

23. 'Geoffroy in this article', &c.: I have not traced the reference.

PAGE 174. 15. metaphysics were: before the sixteenth century the singular form 'metaphysic' was most commonly used; then, on the analogy of the Greek μετὰ τὰ φυσικά, the plural form, but usually with a singular verb.

18. 'The true science of metaphysics', &c.: this and the following aphorisms are from the chapter on 'Philosophy' (Titre 12).

PAGE 175. 26. 'It is by means of familiar words', &c.: chapter xxii. 99.

PAGE 176. 12. 'Be profound', &c.: chapter xxiii. 36.

19. 'spirits, lovers of light', &c.: chapter iv. 63, 'On the Nature of Spirits'.

21. Buffon: Georges Louis Leclerc, Comte de Buffon (1707-88),

French zoologist, botanist, and mineralogist, wrote a vast Histoire naturelle, in thirty-six volumes. His famous Discours sur le Style was delivered as his inaugural address on his admission to the Academy in 1753.

PAGE 177, 2. 'to consider too curiously': Hamlet, v. 1.

6. 'I cannot build': this and the following aphorisms are from the preliminary chapter, 'the Author painted by himself'.

29. 'One should be fearful': chapter i. 91, 'On Religion'.

31. 'There is a great difference': ibid. 85.

PAGE 178. 1. 'May I say it': chapter i. 6.

3. 'Do not bring': chapter xi. 37, 'On Truth'.

23. 'Why is even a bad preacher': this and the following are all from chapter i, 'On Religion'.

PAGE 179. 10. neither a theology nor a theosophy: θεοσοφία ('wisdom concerning God') is supposed to be obtained by direct intuition of the Divine Essence, while theology claims to be based on Revelation. They both differ from philosophy, which is founded on human reasoning.

PAGE 180. 4. Joachim of Flora: a famous mediaeval mystic, born about 1145, abbot of the monastery of Corace in Calabria, from which he retired to set up a stricter order near Cosenza, styled 'St. John in Floris'. His study of the Apocalypse led him to proclaim three stages in the history of the world, corresponding to the three Persons of the Trinity, that of the Father from the Creation to the birth of Christ, that of the Son from the Incarnation to 1260, and that of the Holy Spirit from 1260 onwards; see note to p. 154, 13.

5. St. Francis: see Essay on 'Pagan and Mediaeval Religious Sentiment', passim.

11. Jansenists and Jesuits: the Jansenists were a religious sect of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, named after Cornelis Jansen (1585-1638), who denied the freedom of the will and the possibility of resisting divine grace. These errors, found in a work of Jansen on St. Augustine, published after his death, were condemned by Urban III in 1641. Pascal's greatest work, the Lettres Provinciales (1656), was written to support the Jansenist position.

19. 'We ought to lay stress': chapter i. 130.

27. 'Many are called; few are chosen': Matthew xx. 16.

29. 'We are children of wrath': Ephesians ii. 3.

30. 'We are all the children of God': Galatians iii. 26.

31. 'I came not to call': Mark ii. 17.

PAGE 181. 2. 'The Jansenists erect "grace"': chapter i. 135.

12. 'The Jansenists tell men': this and the next quotation are from chapter i. 131, 132 respectively.

PAGE 182. 1. 'Ignorance': chapter xxiii. 54, 'On the Qualities of a Writer'. Arnold quotes this aphorism above, p. 28, 13.

7. 'With the fever': chapter xxiii. 128.

15. 'Fiction has no business': chapter xxiv. 6, 'On some Novels of the Day'.

31. Wordsworth's sonnet: the thought of this unrhymed poem—it is not a sonnet—published in 1827, is that just as no star is of diviner origin or purer essence than another, but 'all are the undying offspring of one Sire', so too the Poet should be content to 'shine to the measure of his heaven-born light'.

34. 'Whether one is an eagle': chapter xxiii. 18.

PAGE 183. 15. Wesley: John Wesley (1703–91), English divine and minister in the Church of England, to which he always protested his adherence—though, according to the decision of Lord Mansfield, his custom of ordaining was itself equivalent to separation—founded the sect of the Methodists, at first strict-living members of the Church of England. His writings comprise forty volumes of Sermons, Notes on the New Testament, Appeals to Men of Reason and Religion, and his Journal.

Swedenborg: Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), Swedish scientist, philosopher, and mystic, regarded himself as the precursor of a new dispensation, of which the New Jerusalem in the Apocalypse was the figure, but his followers formed themselves into a distinct congregation only after his death. He wrote numerous works on doctrinal, eschatological, and theosophical subjects, and expositions of the Bible.

23. 'Plato shows us nothing': chapter xxiv. 1, 'On Writers of Antiquity'.

38. Nicole: Pierre Nicole (1625–95), one of the Jansenists, took a large share in collecting material for the Provinciales, of which he published a Latin translation in 1658. His best-known works are the Lettres sur les Imaginaires, 1664, Lettres sur les Visionnaires, 1666, and the Essais de Morale, in fourteen vols., the first of which appeared in 1671.

39. 'Nicole is a Pascal': chapter xxiv. 2, 6, 'On Religious Writers'.

PAGE 184. 7. Bossuet of Lord Macaulay: Arnold is perhaps thinking of a paragraph on the 'Influence of French literature' in the third chapter of Macaulay's History: 'No other country could produce a tragic poet equal to Racine, a comic poet equal to Molière, a trifle so agreeable as La Fontaine, a rhetorician so skilful as Bossuet'. But here there is no disparagement; and elsewhere he always speaks of Bossuet with respect, calling him in one place 'the greatest Doctor that the Church of Rome has produced since the schism of the sixteenth century'.

9. 'Bossuet employs': chapter xxiv. 2, 10.

26. 'Those who find Racine': the aphorisms on Racine and Boileau are from chapter xxiv. 5, 'On Poets and Romance-writers'.

PAGE 185. 8. Boileau: Nicolas Boileau (1636–1711), French poet and critic, known as the 'Lawgiver of Parnassus', exercised a more powerful and lasting influence over French literature than any other critic has ever enjoyed. His works include twelve Satires, twelve Epistles, an Art Poétique, and Le Lutrin (a serio-comic poem).

'Boileau is a powerful poet': chapter xxiv. 5, 14.

10. Pope also: cf. p. 67, 6 sqq.

23. 'Voltaire's wits': chapter xxiv. 4, 22 sqq.

PAGE 186. 11. 'That weight in the speaker': ibid. 4. 35.

22. 'Rousseau imparted': ibid. 4, 42.

PAGE 187. 3. affinity with Coleridge: the political philosophy of Coleridge is now almost forgotten, yet he spoke of himself habitually as the heir of Burke. In all his writings he was the declared foe of the rights of man, Jacobinism, and the sovereignty of the people. The State, he held, so far from being a piece of mechanism put together at the will of individuals, has a life of its own which at countless points controls, no less than it is controlled by, theirs.

8. 'The ancients were attached': chapter xvii, 'Of Antiquity'.

21. A great many words: ibid.

31. 'Let your cry be': chapter xv. 5, 15, 'Of Liberty'.

40. 'Liberty!!!' ibid.

PAGE 188. 9. 'brilliant epigrammatic things': chapter vii. 62, 73; iv. 39.

22. 'Vivre, c'est penser . . .': chapter v. 30; xi. 36.

36. his eye was single: a reference to Matthew vi. 22.

PAGE 189. 3. in the case of Coleridge: this was largely due to his long-continued habit of taking opium, a habit formed at Malta (1804-6), and never completely broken.

5. the same penetration: these are references to Raynal's prefatory Memoir.

PAGE 190. 30. Lord Macaulay: for further criticism of Lord Macaulay cf. the beginning and end of the Essay on The Literary Influence of Academies.

PAGE 191. 24. the mark of Dagon: the worship of Dagon, god of the Philistines, with temples at Gaza and Ashdod, was pre-Philistine and Canaanitish: he is generally described as a sea-monster, half-man, half-fish, though Philo Byblius makes him a corn-god. The reference here is to 1 Samuel v.

SPINOZA AND THE BIBLE

This essay was first published in Macmillan's Magazine for December, 1863, under the title, 'A word more about Spinoza'; embodied in it are two long extracts from the essay on Colenso mentioned in the note to p. 27, 35.

PAGE 192. 1. 'By the sentence of the angels': the form of anathema printed by Van Vloten in his Supplementum, and partly reproduced here, is itself only an abridgement of the original.

5. 'Joshua anathematised Jericho': cf. Joshua vi. 17.

6. 'Elisha cursed the children': cf. 2 Kings ii. 24.

22. the Jews of the Portuguese synagogue: in 1593 a small company of Marranos—as the forcibly-converted Portuguese Jews were called—sailed from Portugal and made their way to Amsterdam; other families followed, amongst them Abraham d'Espinoza, the grandfather of Baruch. In that city Baruch de Spinoza was born on November 24, 1632.

34. Voltaire's disparagement: Voltaire refers to Spinoza in various places, always contrasting his supposed impious doctrines with his moral life. 'Il renversait tous les principes de la morale, en étant lui-même d'une vertu rigide.' ('He violated all the principles of morality whilst he himself was of the most unbending virtue.') Voltaire's best-known criticism of Spinoza is contained in the famous verses:

Alors un petit Juif, au long nez, au teint blême, Pauvre, mais satisfait, pensif et retiré,
Esprit subtil et creux, moins lu que célébré,
Caché sous le manteau de Descartes, son maître, Marchant à pas comptés, s'approcha du grand être:
'Pardonnez-moi,' dit-il, en lui parlant tout bas,
'Mais je pense, entre nous, que vous n'existez pas.'

Poés. philos. : Les Systèmes.

In the Lettre sur Spinoza, in Mélanges Littéraires, he speaks of the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus as Spinoza's 'most profound and best work', the erudition of which he could not but admire while condemning its sentiments.

Bayle's detraction: Bayle gave a long article to Spinoza in his Dictionary, made up of anecdote, gossip, and criticism; it was closely copied by Diderot in the Encyclopaedia, and became the principal source of knowledge about Spinoza for French philosophers of the eighteenth century. In his article Bayle speaks of Spinoza as an atheist, and of his philosophy as an 'absurd and monstrous theory'.

PAGE 193. 1. the repellent form: the geometrical form of the Ethics of Spinoza, with its definitions, axioms, propositions, and corollaries, as in Euclid, follows a suggestion of Descartes.

10. An avowed translation: see p. 62, 34 and note.

13. published in his lifetime: the Tractatus was published, according to its title-page, at Hamburg, but in reality at Amsterdam, in 1670. The Principles of Descartes' Philosophy had been published in 1663; and the Opera Posthuma—including the Ethica, Tractatus politicus, Tractatus de intellectus emendatione, various Correspondence, and a Compendium of Hebrew Grammar—in 1677.

17. one such passage: Tractatus, p. 373; Translation, p. 25. The passage is more accurately translated in an English version of 1689, 'I confess [they pretend], they can never enough admire the profound Mysteries of the Scripture, yet I cannot perceive they teach anything, but the speculations of Aristotle and Plato, to which, that they may not seem followers of the Gentiles, they have fitted and accommodated the Scripture; and as if it were not enough for these Men to run mad with the Greeks, would have the very Prophets also to doat [with them too].'

37. the weeping or of the laughing philosopher: Heracleitus of Ephesus (circ. 513 B. C.) was known as 'the obscure' or 'the weeping philosopher'; Democritus of Abdera (circ. 460 B. C.) as 'the laughing philosopher'. The two were commonly contrasted; e. g. Seneca, de Ira, ii. 10; Juvenal, x. 34.

PAGE 194. 3. in his preface: p. 15. The Translator writes 'frequent, though by no means universal, disfavour'.

22. at the present moment: in 1863, when the excitement aroused by Dr. Colenso's Biblical Exegesis was at its height.

33. love, joy, and peace: an allusion to Galatians v. 22.

36. Well, then: there are good grounds for supposing the Tractatus to be, in its origin, a personal Apologia in answer to the sentence of excommunication, very few grounds for seeing in it, as Arnold does, an attempt to edify by correcting popular misunderstanding of the Bible.

PAGE 195. 8. The comments, &c.: from here to p. 205, 14 is from the paper on Colenso.

30. Rabbinical traditions: after the text of the Law had been fixed, the exposition of its precepts, their preservation, and the teaching of the traditions were entrusted to the Scribes. The comments and explanations of their successors were embodied in the Talmud as put forth by Rabbi Jehuda I at the close of the second century A. D.

PAGE 196. 11. Moses imagined: see Exodus xxxiii. 18; iv. 14; xx. 5; resp.

13. Micaiah: 1 Kings xxii. 19.

15. Daniel: vii. 9.

16. Ezekiel: probably i. 4; but more certainly Isaiah xxxiii. 14. the disciples of Christ: Luke iii. 22.

18. the apostles: Acts ii. 3.

PAGE 197. 8. El Sadai: 'Elôhîm was the generic term for Deity, Jahweh (Jehovah) the personal name of the God of Israel. The term Ēl was common to Semitic tribes; its etymology is doubtful. Other early names were Shaddai (Gen. xvii. 1; Exod. vi. 3), probably the Almighty or All-Sufficient One, perhaps an appellative of Ēl'. (Hastings, Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics.)

9. Jehovah, a self-existent being: the derivation and meaning of the name Jahweh are uncertain, some deriving it from the root hawa = to blow, and interpreting it of a storm-god; others, with more probability, from hayah = to be, in a phenomenal, not ontological, sense, since metaphysical notions of deity were alien from the early Hebrew mind.

11. Samuel imagined: 1 Samuel xv. 29.

12. Jeremiah: xviii. 8 and 10.

Joshua: x. 12 and 13.

22. The wrathful Elisha: 2 Kings iii. 15.

24. The high-bred Isaiah: Isaiah, born circ. 760 B.C., was, according to tradition, the nephew of Amaziah, a relationship supported by the fact that his name is a compound of Jah, a distinction belonging solely to persons of royal blood. Delitzsch speaks of his style as 'a river of clear and limpid water transporting us to eternity on its limpid waves'.

Nahum: Nahum the Elkoshite, the authenticity and unity of whose prophecy have been much disputed, prophesied the fall of Nineveh (608 B.C.).

25. the rustic Ezekiel: the prophetic career of Ezekiel (592-570 B.C.) began in the fifth year of the captivity. He has by no means a 'rustic' style but rather the careful elaborate style of a literary man, writing for prosperous exiles living in easy circumstances. His antecedents are quite unknown; Spinoza speaks of Amos as rusticus, but of Ezekiel's prophecy as 'rudiore stylo scripta'.

Amos: St. Jerome speaks of Amos (circ. 760 B.C.) as 'imperitus sermone sed non scientia'; in point of fact he is very little inferior in style to the best Old Testament writers. An eastern shepherd is not necessarily uncultivated.

PAGE 198. 10. long in the land: an allusion to Deuteronomy v. 33.

22. its vera vita: Spinoza (p. 429) so qualifies the 'life and death, blessing and cursing' set before the Israelites by Moses according to Deuteronomy xxx. 19.

PAGE 199. 1. 'given to know': Mark iv. 11.

4. 'as unto carnal': 1 Corinthians iii. 1.

10. 'were not able to bear': ibid. iii. 2.

28. the foundations of another': ibid. iii. 10 and 11.

30. discrepancies: St. Paul insists upon justification by faith alone (Romans iv. passim); St. James (ii. 20) that 'faith apart from works is barren'. The two statements may be complementary, not contradictory.

37. 'turned the Church': an untraced quotation, not from Spinoza.

PAGE 200. 2. the first chapter of Isaiah: vv. 16 and 17.

11. if we believe in him: 1 John iii. 11.

23. as St. John says: Spinoza refers to John i. 10.

26. 'knew not': 1 Corinthians i. 21.

41. 'thing which had been kept': Matthew xiii. 35.

PAGE 201. 1. the foolishness of the world: cf. 1 Corinthians i. 27.

13. 'as it is only': cf. 15, last paragraph; Opera, i, p. 552.

26. a rewarder of them : Hebrews xi. 6.

PAGE 202. 23. Jeremiah declares : Spinoza quotes Jeremiah xxxi. 35 and 36 in this sense.

26. Scripture . . . like Nature : the text of the passage (cap. vi, Opera, p. 451) which Arnold paraphrases is as follows : 'At Scriptura ea, quae ad eius doctrinam non spectant, directe non docet, quia eius non est, res . . . per causas naturales, neque res mere speculativas docere'.

31. Moses . . . relates : in Exodus xiv. 27 ; in the song of Moses (ibid. xv. 10) occur the words 'Thou didst blow with thy wind'. Spinoza says nothing about an 'east wind'—a reminiscence of Psalm lxxviii. 26.

PAGE 203. 7. the first destruction of Jerusalem, this took place in 586 B.C., in the reign of Zedekiah, the last of the line of kings. The last and final destruction was by the Romans in A.D. 70.

24. after Judas Maccabeus had restored the worship of the Temple : i. e. in 165 B.C.

29. the Macedonian Conquest of Asia : this was accomplished by Alexander the Great, c. 332 B.C.

33. the uninspired judgment of human councils : 'human' is an interpolation of the translator ; Spinoza says 'decrees of certain Councils'—the antithesis in his mind being, not between 'human' and 'Divine' judgments, but between the judgments, both human, of 'prophets' and of 'teachers'.

PAGE 204. 9. 'And the Canaanite' : Genesis xii. 6 ; xiii. 7.

12. 'There arose not' : Deuteronomy xxxiv. 10.

13. 'These are the kings' : Genesis xxxvi. 31 sqq.

17. 'Only Og' : Deuteronomy iii. 11.

21. after David had taken : cf. 2 Samuel xii. 29, 30.

25. 'Beforetime in Israel' : 1 Samuel ix. 9.

31. He apologises : cap. ix, Opera, vol. i, pp. 498, 502 : 'There is no reason why I should detain the reader longer with these matters. . . . I am unwilling to detain the reader with a wearisome reading'.

40. 'not content' : quoted above, p. 193, 32.

PAGE 205. 7. hateful and hating : an allusion to Titus iii. 3.

12. anticipating Mr. Gladstone : Mr. Gladstone published The State in its Relations with the Church in 1838 ; the book was an argument along Tractarian lines on behalf of Church Establishment, and was violently attacked by Macaulay in the Edinburgh Review, April 1839.

20. Revelation differs : it is to be observed that Spinoza makes revelation and prophecy identical. This paragraph summarizes the contents of Spinoza's first chapter, 'On Prophecy.'

27. verum nec nobis : Opera, vol. i, p. 391.

29. how it arose : that is, how the Scripturae documenta arose, not the revelation which they contain.

39. the waters of the Red Sea : cf. p. 202, 31.

41. the Shunammite's son: the incident is related in 2 Kings iv.

PAGE 206. 1. the rainbow: see Genesis ix. 13.

4. the voice . . . on Mount Sinai: see Exodus xix, xx.

5. vera vox: cap. i, Opera, vol. i, p. 379.

12. nisi Scripturae: ibid. p. 380.

27. Monere volo: cap. vi, Opera, vol. i, p. 457: 'in discussing miracles I should remark that I have proceeded otherwise than when treating of prophecy, . . . and this I did of set purpose; because in the case of prophecy, since it goes beyond the reach of our faculties and the question is merely a theological one, I can neither affirm nor know anything of its nature, apart from revealed principles'.

39. 'a spurious addition': cf. cap. iii; Opera, vol. i, p. 460: 'sacri-legi illi qui Scripturam plurimis in locis adulterare non sunt veriti'.

PAGE 207. 13. equipollent: of equal validity or value.

23. essentially different character: the difference between the 'nationalism' of the early school of prophets and the 'universalism' of exilic prophecy lies rather in their scope than in their content. Hence Spinoza's 'promiscuous' use of them.

27. a chance expression of Jeremiah: in xxxi. 35, 36: 'Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars by night, . . . If those ordinances depart from before me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before me for ever.'

32. Be fruitful: Genesis ix. 1.

PAGE 208. 10. the 26th verse: Spinoza alludes to this in cap. xvii, Opera, vol. i, p. 581. The Authorized Version translates, 'I polluted them in their own gifts, in that they caused to pass through the fire all that openeth the womb, that I might make them desolate, to the end that they might know that I am the Lord.' The word translated 'caused to pass through'—there is no 'fire' in the original—is the same as that used in Exodus xiii. 12, where the A. V. translates 'set apart'. This is given as a substitute for 'caused to pass through' in the margin of the Revised Version of the verse in Ezekiel, and it is the sense adopted by Spinoza, who renders the passage 'remittendo omnem aperturam vulvae'. The retention of the A. V. translation by the Revisers suggests that it is not an 'entire mistranslation' and that the prophet intended to refer rather to the idolatry of the whole people than to the special privileges of the tribe of Levi.

15. Mr. Mill: see Representative Government, ii, ad fin.: 'Under the protection . . . of their sacred character, the Prophets were a power in the nation, often more than a match for kings and priests.' There is much more to the same effect.

Dr. Stanley: cf. p. 28, 20, and note. The reference here is to Lecture XX, 'On the Nature of the Prophetical Teaching,' in the Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, published 1856.

19. one of her main elements: Spinoza says (cap. xviii, Opera, vol. i, p. 587) that 'the prophets, mere private individuals, by the freedom of their admonitions, warnings, chidings, and denunciations, seem rather to have excited than improved the people, who would have yielded and been corrected had they been addressed by their kings or chiefs. . . . Besides this, there are other instances which plainly show that religion took more damage than benefit from such liberty; to say nothing of the fact that disastrous civil wars arose out of the assertion by the prophets of their right to speak as they pleased.'

31. in his Letters: eighty-three letters of his correspondence are printed in Vloten and Land's edition of the Opera.

40. not yet translated: Robert Willis published in 1870 Benedict de Spinoza, His Life, Correspondence, and Ethics.

PAGE 209. 30. Mr. Maurice: Frederick Denison Maurice (1805-72), Anglican divine and moral philosopher, and one of the first 'Christian Socialists' and advocates of co-operation and trade associations, professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge (1866), and inaugurator of the Working Men's College in Red Lion Square, London.

Goethe's great admiration: this finds expression in his autobiography Dichtung und Wahrheit, bk. xiv and beginning of xvi.

35. Lessing: Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-81), author of Laokoon, besides plays, poems, and other works.

PAGE 210. 1. his denial of final causes: in the Appendix to the First Part of the Ethics Spinoza says, 'There will now be no need of many words to show that nature has set no end before herself, and that all final causes are nothing but human fictions.' Such a belief 'inevitably becomes a mode of proving that the universe and all its parts exist with a view to one particular part of it, namely, man. This is far from the truth. For each thing in Nature might be called its Final Cause with no less propriety than man is' (Duff, Spinoza's Political and Ethical Philosophy, iii).

26. 'Deus naturam dirigit': cap. vi, Opera, vol. i, p. 451.

34. his stoicism: in the passage which Arnold adapts, Spinoza, speaking of the difficulty which the prophets found in harmonizing the order of Nature and human events with the concept which they had formed of the providence of God, contrasts them in this 'with those Philosophers who made happiness to consist in virtue and tranquillity of mind alone, nec student ut Natura iis, sed contra, ut ipsi Naturae pareant'.

PAGE 211. 9. 'Ipsa hominis essentia': Ethics, Part IV, Prop. 18; Opera, vol. i, p. 201.

10. 'Virtus hominis est': ibid., Prop. xx; Opera, vol. i, p. 203.

13. 'Laetitia . . . Tristitia'. Part III, Definitions of the Affects, 2 and 3; Opera, vol. i, p. 173.

31. the locusts visit Egypt: cf. Exodus x. 1.

32. the falling dew: cf. Judges vi. 40.

35. 'repentance to salvation': 2 Corinthians vii. 10.

37. in Dante's words: Purgatorio, xxiii. 81.

39. the fundamental diversity: this lies not so much in the difference of meaning given to the love of God by Christianity and by Spinoza—his language may easily be paralleled from Hebrew and Christian writers—but in the different meanings given to the concept of God. 'When we inquire more narrowly into his [Spinoza's] opinions, we find that the God of Spinoza is a meer Phantom, an imaginary God, who is nothing less than God. . . . He takes the liberty to use the word God, and to take it in a sense unknown to all Christians. This he confesses himself in his twenty-first Letter to Mr. Oldenburg: I acknowledge, says he, that I have a notion of God and Nature, very different from that of the Modern Christians.' (Colerus, Life, translated 1706.)

PAGE 212. 22. M. Van Vloten: Johan Van Vloten, professor at the Academy of Deventer, published in 1862 the volume, Ad Benedicti de Spinoza opera quae supersunt omnia supplementum; it contains Spinoza's early Essay on God and Man, a Dutch version of a Latin original which has disappeared, the Tractatus de Iride, and some letters and fragments of letters. Van Vloten and Land (of Leyden) published the standard edition of Spinoza's Works at The Hague, 1882-3, and it was at Van Vloten's suggestion, in his Dutch Life of Spinoza (1871), that a statue of Spinoza was erected at The Hague and unveiled by Renan, September 14, 1880.

31. Lipsius: Justus Lipsius (1547-1606), the Latinized form of Josse Lips, Flemish philologist and critic, professor of history at Leyden, where he wrote his edition of Seneca and completed his Tacitus, his greatest work. In 1590 he was reconciled to the Catholic Church, and finally settled at Louvain as professor of Latin.

35. 'It is a great mistake': quoted from the Preface to the Supplementum.

36. Kant: Immanuel Kant (1724-1804). German philosopher and founder of the 'critical philosophy'. His first great work, the Critique of Pure Reason (1781), is an attempt to ascertain the nature of the transcendental ideas of the human understanding and to establish the province of certain human knowledge; the second work, the Critique of Practical Reason (1788), treats of the ideas of God, human liberty, and immortality as postulates of practical reason; his third Critique was the Critique of the Power of Judgment (1790).

41. post-Hegelian philosophy: Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770-1831), professor of philosophy at Heidelberg and then at Berlin, creator of the leading system of metaphysical thought in the nineteenth century; his substitution of the category of 'becoming' for that of 'being' revolutionized the existing methods of inquiry in literature, science, and theology. By 'post-Hegelian philosophy' should be understood those systems of Materialism, Rationalism, Pantheism, Positivism, and so forth which derive from certain tendencies of the Hegelian dialectic in an over-accentuated form.

PAGE 213. 1. Leibnitz: see note to p. 45, 19. Leibnitz visited Spinoza at Amsterdam in 1677, and probably read there the MS. of the Ethics. But the denial of final causes displeased him, and his thought took an Aristotelian turn until its final expression was worked out in the theory of Monads in 1685. The relations of Leibnitz and Spinoza are ably treated in Ludwig Stein's monograph, Leibniz und Spinoza, Berlin, 1890.

7. Coryphaei: in the Attic drama the leader of the chorus was called κορυφαῖος; hence the word came to be used metaphorically (seventeenth century) of the chief or leader of a party, sect, school, &c.

14. Uction, indeed: all from this point to p. 216, 12, is from the paper on Colenso.

25. Strauss: see note to p. 29, 21. The reference appears to be to the Leben Jesu, 2nd part, ch. ix.

34. summum bonum: according to Aristotle, the 'highest good' is the happiness dependent upon the rational or virtuous activity of the soul throughout the whole of its life; others have placed it in pleasure, absence of pain, virtue, the enjoyment of God, and so forth.

37. 'The love of God': Opera, vol. i, pp. 423, 425.

PAGE 214. 3. the Masora: the textual tradition of the Hebrew Bible, an official registration of its words, consonants, vowels, and accents. As early as the first century B. C. scholars, copyists, and revisers were trained and employed to fix the Hebrew text. The name = 'to bind' or 'to hand down'.

5. 'What!' he cries: Arnold does not quote from Spinoza here; he claims to interpret his attitude.

7. 'which Moses can dash': see Exodus xxxii. 19.

9. 'book of the Covenant': the code of law, embodied in Exodus xx. 22-xxiii. 33.

10. 'book of the Wars of God': the only mention of this last work, a collection of songs, celebrating the victories of Israel over their neighbours, is in Numbers xxi. 14.

25. Simon de Vries: a wealthy young student of medicine who was one of Spinoza's friends at Amsterdam. After his death his heirs offered Spinoza an annuity of 500 florins, and he consented to take one of 300.

27. He was asked: this was never more than a suggestion on the part of some officers attached to the Prince de Condé at Utrecht, that 'he might count upon a pension' if he would dedicate a book to Louis XIV.

33. Truth, he thought: Meyer, in the Preface to B. D. S. Opera

Posthuma, Amsterdam, 1677, refers to the forty-fourth Definition 'of the Passions' in the Third Part of the Ethics, and to the Appendix to the Fourth Part, as showing that Spinoza held that 'those who desire to aid others by counsel or deed to the common good shall in no wise endeavour themselves that a doctrine be called after their name'.

34. 'Unless', he said: this quotation cannot be traced.

40. Doubtless thou art: Isaiah lxiii. 16.

PAGE 215. 25. a single pregnant sentence: 'all things flow.' Plato, Cratylus, 402 A, calls the disciples of Heracleitus τούς ρέοντας, because they affirm ὅτι πάντα χωρεῖ καὶ οὐδὲν μένει. This category of becoming is the foundation of Hegelian dialectic.

33. in the grand style: the phrase has already occurred in these essays, on p. 37, 29, of Cardinal Richelieu.

38. 'There is no possible view': quoted from the famous conversation of Lessing and Jacobi in Jacobi's Über die Lehre des Spinoza in Briefen an Herrn Moses Mendelssohn; Werke, vol. iv (1), p. 55, 1819.

39. Lessing: It is clear that Lessing never fully accepted Spinoza's point of view as applicable to the theory of human nature and the conduct of life. He wrote of Mendelssohn, 'His sincerity and philosophic turn of mind make me look on him as one that will be a second Spinoza. To make him like the first nothing but his errors will be wanting' (Pollock). Arnold's phrase, a 'view of life', for the 'Philosophie' of the original, obscures this very point.

PAGE 216. 5. 'I have seen Hegel': quoted from Geständnisse; Werke, vol. xiv, p. 276.

10. 'His life was a copy': Zur Geschichte der Religion u. Philosophie in Deutschland; Werke, vol. v, p. 124.

22. Fra Angelico: Guido da Pietro (1387-1455), known as Fra Angelico from the heavenly beauty of his painting, entered the Dominican convent at Fiesole in 1407. From 1436-45 he was at San Marco, in Florence, where most of his best fresco-work was done; thence he was summoned to Rome, where he painted the frescoes of the Chapel of the Sacrament in the Vatican. The 'Last Judgment' is now in the Academy of Fine Arts at Florence.

30. Beelzebub: 'lord of flies,' a contemptuous Hebrew variant of Beelzebul, 'lord of the high place,' the Philistine god of Ekron.

31. 'in my Father's house': John xiv. 2.

34. an 'immortal longing': 'I have immortal longings in me,' Antony and Cleopatra, v. ii. 275.

37. vera vita: see p. 198, 32.

MARCUS AURELIUS

First published in the Victoria Magazine for November 1863.

PAGE 217. 10. Mr. Mill says, in his book on Liberty: John Stuart Mill published his famous Essay on Liberty in 1859, in defence of the rights of the individual against society. The passage here quoted is from chapter ii, 'Of the Liberty of Thought and Discussion,' where Mill asserts that the end of Christian morality is 'Innocence rather than Nobleness, Abstinence from Evil rather than energetic Pursuit of Good: in its precepts (as has been well said) "thou shalt not" predominates unduly over "thou shalt".'

25. 'vita sine proposito': this sentence does not occur in the Imitation; omitting 'languida et', it is from Seneca, Epist. xv. 3, 45.

26. 'Omni die renovare': i. 19.

28. 'Secundum propositum': ibid.

29. 'Raro etiam unum': i. 11.

31. 'Semper aliquid certi': i. 19.

32. 'Tibi ipsi violentiam': i. 24; but the text is 'qui sibi ipsi . . . facit'.

PAGE 218. 11. Epictetus: one of the greatest Stoic philosophers, Epictetus was born at Hierapolis, in Phrygia, and was brought as a slave to Rome by his master, Epaphroditus, the freedman of Nero. He left no writings, but four books of Discourses and an Encheiridion, or Handbook, of his teaching were written by his pupil Arrian, from notes taken at his lectures.

28. Empedocles: Greek statesman, prophet, physicist, physician, and reformer (490-430 B.C.). In addition to the four elements he postulated two agencies to control them, to which he gave the names of Love and Hate. These answer to what modern scientists term the forces of attraction and repulsion, though, with Empedocles, their activity extends to ethical and national life. According to tradition, Empedocles, who was a native of Sicily, met his death by throwing himself into the crater of Mount Etna, in order that the mystery of his disappearance might bring about the belief that he was a god.

Arnold's dramatic poem, Empedocles on Etna (1852), contains several lyrical passages of great beauty.

PAGE 219. 3. the prayer of Epictetus: the passage quoted from Epictetus' Encheiridion, c. 53, is itself a quotation from the Hymn to Zeus by the Stoic Cleanthes (301-232 B.C.), large fragments of which are preserved in Stobaeus.

8. 'Let thy loving spirit': Psalm cxliii. 10 (Prayer Book version).

9. 'The Lord shall be unto thee': Isaiah lx. 20, quoted incorrectly.

11. 'Unto you that fear my name': Malachi iv. 2.

13. 'Born, not of blood': John i. 13.

14. 'Except a man be born again': ibid. iii. 3.

16. 'Whatsoever is born of God': 1 John v. 4.

20. 'all things are possible to him': Mark ix. 23.

21. 'he is a new creature': 2 Corinthians v. 17.

22. Epictetus says: Encheiridion, 43.

30. 'I say not unto thee': Matthew xviii. 22.

39. 'Thou shalt love God and thy neighbour': Matthew xxii. 37-9.

PAGE 220. 4. the school from which he proceeds: the Utilitarian school, propagating the theories of Bentham. Mill's Political Economy (1845) and Utilitarianism (1863) are amongst the best expositions of this system.

14. Mr. Long: George Long (1800-79), fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Professor of Greek and of Latin, successively, at University College, London, published his translation of Marcus Aurelius in 1862. A translation of Epictetus followed in 1877.

28. Plutarch's Roman Lives: Plutarch, The Civil Wars of Rome, Select Lives, translated, with Notes, by G. L., 1844.

35. 'example of life': from the Sixth Article of Religion in the Book of Common Prayer: 'On the sufficiency of the Scriptures.'

PAGE 221. 2. the translation of . . . Jeremy Collier: this was published in 1701. Jeremy Collier (1650-1726), a non-juring clergyman and pamphleteer, is best known for his Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage (1697-8). This brought down upon Collier the enmity of Dryden, Vanbrugh, and Congreve, but did much to reform the stage.

40. In another striking passage: book iii. 14.

PAGE 222. 28. Ethic and Dialectic: these are the older forms and the only ones used by fourteenth- or fifteenth-century writers. The form Ethic comes through the French Éthique from the Greek ἠθική (τέχνη); Ethics from the Greek τὰ ἠθικά. Similarly Dialectic from the Greek ἡ διαλεκτική (τέχνη); Dialectics from the Latin dialectica, which was regarded as a neuter plural form.

29. Hellenes and Romans: Hellenes, strictly speaking, are people Greek in blood, descendants of the mythical Hellen, son of Deucalion; the term 'Greeks' connotes, more generally, those over whom Greek culture extended.

32. Marcus Antoninus instead of Marcus Aurelius: the future emperor's original name was Marcus Annius Verus; after his adoption by Antoninus Pius he was styled M. Aelius Aurelius Verus, to which was shortly afterwards added the title Caesar.

On succeeding to the throne he dropped the names Aelius and Verus, and took that of Antoninus, being henceforth known as M. Aurelius Antoninus.

PAGE 223. 3. volitare per ora virum: 'to fly from mouth to mouth of men,' quoted from Ennius in Cicero, Tuscul. i. 15. 34:

'cur? volito vivu' per ora virum.'

7. pence and not denarii: e. g. Matthew xviii. 28; Mark xiv. 5; Luke vii. 41; x. 35.

8. the name of Arouet: but in bibliography, as in the Catalogue of the British Museum Library, this is correct.

36. An old Lyons commentator: 'Marci Philosophi scriptio abscissa et horrida est sed firma et potens quae sapit Imperatorem': Preface to the edition by Franciscus de la Bottière, Lyons, 1626.

PAGE 224. 3. the Greek of the New Testament: this, like the Greek of M. Aurelius, belongs to the κοινή διάλεκτος, the world-speech which was in common use since the conquests of Alexander the Great. It was the language, not only of letters, but also of commerce and everyday life, and so general was its usage that into it the decrees of the Roman Senate and imperial governors were always translated. It is a mistake, as the recent labours of papyrologists show, to suppose that because the writers of the New Testament were not Atticists they were ignorant purveyors of slang and vulgarisms. A more 'accurate' English Testament has appeared in the Revised Version of the Bible (1870-84).

13. perhaps the most beautiful figure in history: it is impossible not to feel that this judgement is an exaggeration, due to personal sympathy, on the part of Arnold, with the 'saint and exemplar of Agnosticism'.

27. Saint Louis: Louis IX, son of Louis VIII and Blanche of Castile, was born in 1215, succeeded to the throne at the age of eleven, died in 1270, and was canonized by Boniface VIII in 1297. Famous throughout Europe as the perfect type of 'beau chevalier', he took part in the Crusades of 1248 and 1270, and raised France to such prestige that in 1264 he was called in to arbitrate between Henry III of England and his turbulent barons.

Alfred: Alfred the Great (848?-900), fifth son of Ethelwulf, King of Wessex, succeeded to the throne in 871.

32. Trajan talks 'of our enlightened age': the reference appears to be to Pliny, Letters, xcvi 'Nam et pessimi exempli nec nostri saeculi est.'

41. half barbarous: Alfred himself was a patron of letters, and did much to revive schools of learning in his kingdom. From his own pen we have several translations, besides the compilation called Blostman, i. e. blossoms = anthology, the first part of which is based on the Soliloquies of S. Augustine, and the rest of it a commonplace-book written by Alfred himself, invaluable for the history of his time.

The reign of Louis IX certainly belonged to an age of criticism, and so far resembled the nineteenth century: it witnessed the teaching of Alexander of Hales, S. Bonaventura, Albertus Magnus, and S. Thomas Aquinas.

PAGE 225. 7. Antoninus Pius: Titus Antoninus, surnamed Pius, succeeded Hadrian in 138 and died in 161. His reign was marked by peace, the result of Hadrian's able administration, the only serious warfare being in Britain.

11. The barbarians were pressing: this was due to migratory movements among the German tribes of northern and central Europe, on the Elbe and the Vistula; these movements induced pressure on the Marcomanni, Quadi, Buri, and other southern tribes, who in turn pressed upon Roman territory, and overran Dacia, Pannonia, Raetia, and Noricum.

22. the record of his inward life: the true title of the book is unknown. Xylander, who published the first edition (Zurich, 1558), called it Μάρκου Ἀντωνίνου Αὐτοκράτορος τῶν εἰς ἑαυτὸν βιβλία ιβ ('Marci Antonini Imperatoris ad seipsum Libri xii'), but the manuscript from which he printed is now lost, and the only other manuscript, now in the Vatican, which contains the twelve books, has no title.

30. 'wild and dreamlike trade,' &c. : I have not found the quotation.

35. 'From my mother,' &c. : Meditations, i. 3; she was Domitia Calvilla, also called Lucilla, wife of Annius Verus.

PAGE 226. 1. the sixth satire of Juvenal: D. Junius Juvenalis (A. D. 55-135) published his sixteen Satires in five books at different times; of these the sixth paints in heightened colours the fashions, follies, and vices of contemporary women.

'From my tutor': Med. i. 5; his τροφεύς was the man who instructed him in the rudiments of education; his name is unknown, but the Emperor gives the names of many of his later teachers.

6. the Graeculus esuriens: 'hungry little Greek.'

Grammaticus, rhetor, geometres, pictor, aliptes,
Augur, schoenobates, medicus, magus, omnia novit
Graeculus esuriens.

Juvenal, iii. 76 sqq.

18. caret quia vate sacro: 'because he lacks an inspired singer': an allusion to Horace, Odes, iv. 9. 25.

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona multi: sed omnes inlacrimabiles urgentur ignotique longa nocte, carent quia vate sacro.

23. Avidius Cassius: see Dio Cassius, Epitome 72. Avidius Cassius, who became governor of Syria about A. D. 164, brought to a successful conclusion the Parthian War which broke out at the beginning of M. Aurelius' reign. In A. D. 175 he organized a revolt and was proclaimed emperor, in the belief that M. Aurelius was dead. When this news proved false, Cassius was murdered by his own adherents. The emperor's remark quoted in the text occurs in a letter to the Roman Senate.

PAGE 227. 8. he persecuted the Christians: with the reign of M. Aurelius an active persecution began throughout the Empire; and Fronto, the emperor's preceptor and friend, inaugurated a literary propaganda against the Christians. Hitherto persecution had been administrative, not legal, but now gradually it became a settled principle of imperial policy, from religious and political considerations.

9. he had for his son . . . Commodus: Commodus was the first emperor since Domitian to succeed by right of birth, though popular rumour declared that he was the son of a gladiator. Hated and despised for his cruelty, weakness, and profligacy, he was murdered by a conspiracy in the palace after a reign of twelve years (180-192).

the persecution at Lyons: a vivid account of this persecution (A. D. 177) is contained in the Epistle of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne to the Churches of Asia and Phrygia, preserved in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. v. 1-4. The names of forty-eight martyrs are known.

10. Attalus: all that is known of him is that he was a native of Pergamus, 'a pillar and foundation of the church of that place.'

Pothinus: the predecessor of S. Irenaeus and first bishop of Lyons.

11. the persecution at Smyrna: recorded in the Epistle of the Church of Smyrna to the Church sojourning at Philomelium (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 24); most probably it took place in 156.

17. the letter . . . directing that no Christian should be punished: this letter is extant in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 24.

20. his alleged answer: this was in reply to the 'legatus' of Lyons, who had asked for direction; in it the emperor laid down that those Christians who denied should be set free, and those who confessed beaten to death.

41. fully aware of the spirit and holiness: it is an error to speak of Trajan, Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius as having the same conception of Christianity or sharing the same attitude towards it. The rescripts of Trajan expressly lay down that Christians are not to be sought out, and Melito of Sardis, in his Apology, addressed to M. Aurelius (Euseb. iv. 26), mentions letters of Antoninus Pius to cities in Greece and Thrace to the same effect, as a plea for less harsh treatment. The revival of the philosophic schools, notably that of the Cynics, through the influence of M. Aurelius, was largely responsible for a change of attitude. Nor can it be argued that the emperor was ignorant of the Christian doctrine; the Apologies of Quadratus and Aristides, addressed to Hadrian, the First Apology of Justin Martyr, addressed to Antoninus Pius and himself, were in circulation, and his own reign saw the appearance of the Apologies of Melito and Athenagoras, the Octavius of Minucius Felix, and, probably, the Apologeticus contra Nationes of Tertullian.

PAGE 228. 7. Mormonism: the Mormons, or 'Latter-day Saints', are a sect founded by Joseph Smith, junior, at Manchester, New York, in 1830, and, since 1848, largely concentrated round Salt Lake City, Utah. Their best-known tenet is that the glory of the saints will be in proportion to the number of their wives and children. The Book of Mormon, in which Joseph Smith was declared to be God's prophet, contains a mythical history of America, from Babel to A. D. 5, and propounds the doctrine that a man may be 'sealed' to any number of women in order to procreate bodies for thousands of saints long waiting incarnation. They accept the Bible and look for the Second Coming of Christ.

21. the severe expressions of Tacitus: Annals xv. 44. On the night of July 18, 64, a fire broke out which destroyed the greater part of Rome. It was believed that incendiaries had been at work, and this led to the arrest and punishment of a great multitude of persons whom the vulgar called Christians. 'Christus,' says Tacitus, 'from whom this name was derived, was executed when Tiberius was Imperator, by Pontius Pilatus, the procurator. The pernicious superstition . . . again broke out, even in the city, the meeting-place of all horrible and immoral practices from all quarters of the world (cuncta undique atrociora aut pudenda). But he adds that they were punished not so much on the charge of incendiarism as because they were 'convicted of hatred of the human race.'

PAGE 229. 1. the character of secret assemblages: the right of forming associations (collegia, sodalitates) belonged, theoretically, to all Roman citizens except soldiers, but, in practice, this right was much curtailed. Associations for sepulchral purposes, registered in the name of some individual who held the property, were, however, common, and it was as one of such collegia tenuiorum that the Christians were able to own their cemeteries, under the presidency of their episcopus, without transgressing the law against secret associations.

35. Christianity grew up in the catacombs: these early Christian burial-places, containing at least two million graves, are hollowed out of the stratum of tufa that surmounts the basic stone of Rome, at a depth of thirty-three to forty-nine feet below the surface. Galleries diverge in all directions, and burial-chambers (cubicula) open to right and left along the passages. The graves (loculi) are cut out of the rock sides of the galleries and the chambers.

the Palatine: the Palatine Hill was the quarter where the great nobles and public men lived. On the northern side stood the temple of Augustus, and here was the stately Flavian Palace of Domitian and the great temple of Apollo.

PAGE 230. 27. Marcia: when Commodus slew Quadratus, he took his mistress Marcia as his own favourite. After contriving his death she became the wife of his chamberlain, Eclectus, and was herself put to death by Julianus. Cf. Dio Cassius, lxxii. 4; lxxiii. 16. Xiphilinus is the authority for her friendliness towards the Christians.

PAGE 231. 13. Such a memorandum: i. 12. This was the teaching of Alexander the Platonic.

22. 'the idea of a polity': ibid. i. 14.

27. 'drive at practice': see p. 222, 13.

29. 'the greatest part': iv. 24.

37. We ought to check: iii. 4.

PAGE 232. 9. Franklin: Benjamin Franklin (1706-90), American diplomat, scientist, and statesman. His 'practicalness' is shown by his belief in the 'art of virtue'—temperance, cleanliness, frugality, and humility—and his precept to imitate Christ and Socrates, and his determination to try a week's strict attention to each of the thirteen virtues successively, according to his enumeration of them.

10. his favourite text: iv. 2.

19. 'their Father which seeth in secret': Matthew vi. 6.

25. 'One man': v. 6.

40. 'What more dost thou want': ix. 42.

PAGE 233. 6. The Kingdom of God: Luke xvii. 21. The meaning of the verse is curiously strained by this interpretation.

9. the sentences of Seneca: Lucius Annaeus Seneca (3 B. C.—A. D. 65), a Spaniard of Corduba, wrote on a variety of subjects, but his most important works are philosophical and contemplative—twelve Dialogues, three books On Clemency, seven books On Benefits, and twenty books of Letters addressed to Lucilius. His interest in philosophy was mainly devoted to practical questions and conduct of life.

21. he learned from Maximus: i. 15. Claudius Maximus was a stoic philosopher, who was also highly esteemed by Antoninus Pius.

31. 'Figs, when they are quite ripe': iii. 2.

PAGE 234. 8. 'Men cannot admire': v. 5.

33. 'Suppose that thou hast': viii. 34.

PAGE 235. 4. 'Men seek retreat': iv. 3.

24. 'I have to thank Heaven': i. 17.

38. Apollonius: Apollonius of Chalcis came to Rome in the time of Antoninus Pius to be M. Aurelius' preceptor. He was a rigid Stoic.

Rusticus: Q. Junius Rusticus was the greatest Stoic philosopher of his day; Antoninus valued him highly, and twice raised him to the consulship.

PAGE 236. 16. Tiberius: Tiberius Claudius Nero, born 42 B. C., succeeded his step-father, Augustus, in A. D. 14 and reigned till 37. His wise rule maintained the general prosperity of the Empire, but his reserved crafty nature soon developed into a hard cruelty (rigor animi), and the system of delation and the law of maiestas made his reign to some extent a reign of terror.

Caligula: Gaius, usually known by his nickname of Caligula, the son of Germanicus, succeeded Tiberius in 37, and was murdered by two officers of the Praetorian Guard in 41. His reign saw an attempt to conquer Britain, but when his army reached the shore of the English Channel he ordered the troops to pick up shells on the beach as a sign of his victory over the ocean and then returned. Extravagance, profligacy, and disease left him little more than a madman; his suspiciousness and cruelty were only increased by the frequent plots against his life.

Nero: Nero Claudius Caesar Drusus Germanicus, the last of the Julian line, succeeded Claudius in 54, and died by his own hand, aided by Epaphroditus, in 68, to avoid falling into the hands of Galba. His cruelty and profligacy were boundless; Christians saw in him the Antichrist, and thought that as such he would come again.

Domitian: Domitian, son of Vespasian, succeeded his brother Titus in the Principate in 89. His reign was marked by a great increase of autocratic power, suspicious hatred of the aristocracy, whom he plundered mercilessly, the banishment of philosophers, astrologers, and soothsayers from Rome, and his unusually strict defence of the national religion. In 96 he was killed by a conspiracy.

20. 'A black character': iv. 28.

24. 'About what am I now employing my soul?': v. 11.

34. 'When thou hast assumed': x. 8.

PAGE 237. 8. 'the Happy Islands': they were the abode of Heroes, like Achilles and Diomedes, as we see in the Scholion of Harmodius and Aristogeiton. Sertorius heard of the islands at Cadiz from some sailors who had been there, and he had a wish to go and live in them and rest from his troubles (Plutarch, Sertorius, c. 8). Cf. Odyssey iv. 565 and Pindar, Ol. ii. 129.

10. 'between two infinities': see Meditations iv. 50, 'For see the immensity of time behind, and another endless space before thee.'

20. Consider, for example, the times of Vespasian: iv. 32. Titus Flavius Vespasianus reigned from 69 to 79, succeeding Vitellius. During his reign took place the great rebellion in Judaea, which resulted in the complete destruction of Jerusalem (70).

27. the times of Trajan: M. Ulpius Trajanus became emperor in 98. He greatly increased the imperial prerogatives, finally abolished the delatores, and destroyed the power of the Dacians and Parthians in two successive campaigns. A lasting memorial of the first of these wars still stands in the Forum, Trajan's column, decorated with reliefs depicting incidents of the campaign.

34. 'The things which are much valued': v. 33; the verse quoted is from Hesiod, Works and Days, 197.

PAGE 238. 2. 'Look down from above': ix. 30.

14. 'the prime principle': v. 30.

18. 'When thou wishest': vi. 48.

29. 'Within ten days': iv. 16.

35. 'But if thou requirest': ix. 3.

PAGE 239. 10. O faithless and perverse generation!: Luke ix. 41.

13. 'Short is the little': x. 15.

25. 'whatever happens to every man': vi. 45; xii. 23; and passim.

The teaching of M. Aurelius is that there are two original principles of all things, matter and reason or God. God is eternal and matter is eternal; they exist independently, but God governs matter, and together they form one whole. If there is no harm to the elements themselves in continually changing into one another, why should a man have any apprehension about the change and dissolution of himself? for it is according to nature; and nothing is evil that is according to nature.

PAGE 240. 3. 'the ruling part of man': iv. 1.

21. 'all things work together': Romans viii. 28.

PAGE 241. 4. he would have been no Justin: S. Justin Martyr, born in Samaria, trained in his youth in Greek philosophies, was converted to Christianity at Ephesus. About A. D. 148 he addressed an Apology for the Christians to Antoninus Pius, in which he claimed that the Christians were good citizens, that they alone taught the truth, and that the pagan myths were invented by evil spirits; he also explained the mysteries of baptism and the eucharist. His Second Apology has the character of an appendix to the First. In 163(?) he was sentenced to death at Rome for refusing to sacrifice to the gods.

6. the Alogi: this heretical sect (about A. D. 170) denied that Christ was the eternal Logos and rejected the Fourth Gospel, which they ascribed to the gnostic Cerinthus. They also rejected the Apocalypse.

10. too much gnosis: the word γνώσις, which in Plato bears the general meaning of 'knowledge', came in ecclesiastical writers to mean 'knowledge supernaturally acquired'; in this sense it was used particularly of the 'secret traditions' of neo-platonizing heretics. In the writings of Clement of Alexandria and of the Alexandrian School generally, however, it bears a more orthodox meaning.

13. the twenty-sixth chapter of St. Matthew: this relates the events of the Passion from the conspiracy of the Jews against Christ to St. Peter's denial.

14. exitiabilis superstitio: see p. 228, 21.

15. 'obstinacy of the Christians': xi. 3. This is the only reference to Christianity in the Meditations.

19. tendentemque manus: 'stretching out his hands in love of the farther shore.' Virgil, Aeneid vi. 314.

INDEX TO THE NOTES

- Ab, 139. 3.
 Academy, Berlin, 62. 27.
 — British, 62. 17.
 — French, 37. 1.
 Acheron, 151. 26.
 Adderley, Mr., 23. 4.
 Addison, 52. 18.
 Adonis, 147. 26.
 Aeschylus, 36. 10 ; 85. 26.
 Albigenians, 99. 33.
 Alexandrine, 66. 2.
 Alogi, 241. 6.
 Alverno, 156. 39.
 Amboise, 96. 4.
 Amos, 197. 25.
 analysts, the English, 43. 28.
 Antichrist, 154. 13.
 Antiochus IV, 137. 20.
 Apparitions, 6. 21.
 Argyll, Duke of, 145. 6.
 Aristophanes, 159. 24.
 Arnim, 128. 18.
 assignats, 51. 27.
 Auckland, Lord, 19. 14.
 Augustine, Saint, 106. 41.
 Aventine, 146. 39.

 Bacon, 67. 21.
 Barrow, 62. 22.
 Bayle, 192. 34.
 Bazancourt, M. de, 61. 9.
 Bellerophon, 150. 38.
 Bennett, James Gordon, 60. 12.
 Bentham, 6. 5.
 Bernouilli, 45. 31.
 Bismark, 123. 24.
 Blois, 96. 4.
 Bohn, Mr., Library of, 47. 9.
 Boileau, 185. 8.
 Bollandists, 144. 22.
 Bossuet, his philosophy of history, 32. 21 ; Spiritual Works, 102. 28 ; Panegyric of St. Paul quoted, 51. 15.
 Brentano, 128. 18.
 Buffon, 176. 21.
 Burke, his writings on the French Revolution, 17. 30 ; quoted, 51. 27 ; 52. 4.
 Byron, his Childe Harold, 171. 16.

 Caligula, 236. 16.
 Calvin, 144. 9.
 Camisards, 99. 38.
Candide, 128. 40.
 Candlish, Dr., 145. 6.
 Carlyle, as political economist, 26. 29 ; as critic of German literature, 116. 27 ; quoted, 120. 37.
 Castlereagh, 132. 9.
 Cavendish, 65. 17.
 Ceres, 135. 41.
 Chalmers, 62. 34.
 Chambord, 96. 4.
 Channing, Dr., 144. 13.
 Charlemagne, 55. 24.
 Charles I of England, 134. 33.
 Charles V, the Emperor, 124. 15.
 Chateaubriand, 65. 32 ; quoted, 164. 40 ; 171. 14 ; underrated in England, 172. 3.
 Chaucer, 67. 2.
 Chenonceaux, 96. 4.
 Chiron, 91. 1.
 Church rates, 23. 36.
 Cicero, quoted, 30. 4 ; 40. 37 ; 54. 28.
Cid, 39. 22. classical, 50. 11.
 Cobbe, F. P., 29. 4 ; 30. 28.
 Cobbett, 26. 26 ; Heine's description of him, 123. 10.
 Colenso, Bishop, 27. 35.

- Coleridge, Hartley, 80. 19.
 — Samuel Taylor, his reading,
 13. 40; quoted, 30. 4; M. de Rémusat's criticism of, 170. 15.
- Communists, 127. 32.
- Conrad von der Rosen, 124. 27.
- Constant, Benjamin, 166. 31.
- Corinthian style, 60. 18.
- Corneille, 39. 22; 45. 3.
- Cortes, 134. 35.
- Creole, 81. 9.
- Cuvier, 65. 17.
- Cybele, 90. 6.
- Dagon, 191. 24.
- D'Alembert, 164. 25.
- Davy, 59. 7.
- decimal system, 16. 4.
- Delille, 170. 39.
- Democritus, 193. 37.
- Diderot, 164. 25.
- diocese, 47. 33.
- Diogenes, 137. 25.
- Dione, 151. 28.
- disinterestedness, 21. 7.
- dithyramb, 24. 5.
- Divorce Court, 32. 2.
- Döllinger, Dr., 134. 35.
- Domitian, 236. 16.
- Donaldson, Dr., 48. 10.
- Edith, 134. 32.
- Elchi, 61. 29.
- El Sadai, 197. 8.
- épiciier, 120. 29.
- Epicurus, 164. 41.
- Eryx, 151. 23.
- Euler, 45. 31.
- Exeter Hall, 7. 17.
- Ezekiel, 197. 25.
- Faraday, 59. 8.
- Fénelon, 66. 2; quoted, 97, 25;
 his Spiritual Works, 102. 28.
- Firdusi, 134. 35.
- Fleury, 29. 33.
- Fontanes, 164. 29.
- Forster, Mr. Charles, 48. 36.
- Francis, Saint, of Assisi, 154. 16.
 — — Borgia, 151. 1.
 — — de Sales, 96. 32; 110. 32.
- Galen, 146. 12.
- garbanzos, 136. 2.
- Gerbet, 68. 11.
- Gladstone, 205. 13.
- gnosis, 241. 10.
- Goerres, 128. 18.
- Goethe, his criticism, 11. 1; his view of Du Bartas, 170. 24; of Heine, 141. 12; of Pascal, 98.
 12; as minister, 118. 12; quoted,
 8. 17; 23. 22; 54. 33; 65. 33.
- Goldsmith, 80. 19.
- Gray, David, 84. 20.
 — Thomas, his use of heroic couplet, 66. 35.
- Gretchen, 133. 28.
- Halevy, 138. 20.
- Health, British College of, 30. 34.
- Hegel, 212. 41.
- Heraclitus, 193. 37.
- Holbein, 124. 19.
- Horace, as satirist, 67. 12; quoted,
 115. 39-116. 9.
- Houghton, Lord, 84. 19.
- Hugo, Victor, 72. 30.
- Hyades, 91. 1.
- Hygeia, 30. 37.
- Idalium, 151. 22.
- Ilissus, 24. 36.
- Imitation of Christ, The*, 102. 28.
- Irene*, 10. 36.
- Irving, Washington, 48. 33.
- Isaiah, 197. 24.
- Isis, 86. 25.
- Jansenists, 180. 11.
- Jeffrey, 173. 21.
- Jehovah, 197. 9.
- Joachim of Flora, 154. 13; 180. 4.
- Journal des Débates*, 47. 35.
- Justification, 32. 20; 199. 30.
- Justin Martyr, 241. 4.
- Kant, 212. 36.
- Keats, quoted, 158. 39; misquoted,
 65. 29.
- Kinglake, 60. 7.
- Kyrie eleison*, 153. 26.

- La Bruyère, 52. 35.
 Lacordaire, 68. 9.
 Lagrange, 45. 31.
 Laharpe, 164. 26.
 Lamartine, 72. 30.
 Lamennais, 68. 1.
 Laplace, 45. 31.
 La Trappe, 115. 4.
 Laura, 138. 25.
 Leibnitz, 45. 19.
 Lessing, 209. 35.
 Limburg, 159. 30.
 Linnaeus, 65. 17.
 Lipsius, 212. 13.
 Louis XIV, his appreciation of Racine, 58. 6.
 — XVIII, 132. 10.
 Lucan, quotation from, 131. 14.
 Lucretius, 67. 7.
 Luther, 32. 20.

 Mabile, 134. 33.
 Macaulay, Lord, his view of English literature, 37. 9 ; on Bossuet, 184. 7 ; on Chateaubriand, 172. 3.
 Macedonius, Saint, 106. 38.
 Malebranche, 55. 25.
 Manzoni, 102. 33.
 Mapperley Hills, 24. 22.
 Marcia, 230. 27.
 Marie Antoinette, 134. 33.
 Marmontel, 53. 12.
 Marochetti, 59. 9.
 Maurice, F. D., 209. 30.
 Melisanda, 134. 34.
 mercury sublimate, 52. 8.
 Migne, 144. 2.
 Milton, as prose writer, 67. 22 ;
   Delille's translation of his Paradise Lost, 170. 39 ; quotation from sonnet, 58. 3.
 Molé, 172. 25.
 Molière, 172. 13.
 Montalembert, 68. 9.
 Morison, 30. 34.
 Müller, 6. 12.

 nadalet, 105. 16.
 Nahum, 197. 24.
 Napoleon III, 55. 20.

 Nero, 236. 16.
 Newman, 49. 27.
 Newton, 43. 11.
 Nicole, 183. 38.
 Nisard, 47. 10.
 note, 49. 39.
 Novalis, 117. 3.

 Obermann, 27. 32 ; 65. 33.
 Omar, 143. 33.
 Orestes, 92. 9.

 Palais Royal, 132. 26.
 Palatine, 212. 41.
 Palgrave, Francis, his Golden Treasury, 57. 24 ; his Handbook, 58.
   22.
 Pascal, 52. 34 ; 98. 12.
 Pedro the Cruel, 134. 35.
 Pepper, Professor, 5. 14.
 Pericles, 14. 24.
 Périgord, 164. 11.
 Philistines, 4. 25.
 Pindar, 13. 41.
 Pius IX, 32. 23.
 Planche, Gustave, 59. 16.
 Pleiades, 91. 35.
 Plutarch, 165. 8.
 Pompeii, 153. 39.
 Pope, Alexander, his translation of Homer, 4. 10 ; Essay on Man, 67. 6.
 Price, Dr., 18. 11.
 Proserpine, 135. 41 ; 150. 41.

 Quintilian, 52. 15 ; 171. 5.

 Racine, 66. 26 ; 58. 6.
 — the younger, 172. 34.
 Raglan, Lord, 61. 27.
Record, The, 23. 28.
 Renan, his Vie de Jésus, 29. 8 ;
   on the French Academy, 40.
   10 ; on Donaldson's Book of Jasher, 48. 10 ; on Irving's Life of Mahomet, 48. 33.
Review, British Quarterly, 21. 41.
 — Church and State, 28. 27.
 — Dublin, 22. 18 ; 143. 1.
 — Edinburgh, 21. 39.
 — Home and Foreign, 22. 15.

- Review, National*, 93. 25.
 — Quarterly, 21. 41.
 — Saturday, 6. 22.
Revue des Deux Mondes, 21. 35.
 Rhampsinitus, 134. 32.
 Rhine provinces, The, 120. 12.
 Richard I, 134. 34.
 Richter, 117. 4.
 Roebuck, Mr., 23. 11.
 Rohrbacher, 68. 12.
 romantic school, 117. 3.
 Rothschild, 137. 29.
 Ruskin, his political economy,
 26. 29; his interpretation of Shakespeare's names, 56. 32;
 quoted, 56. 3.

 Saalfeld, Professor, 132. 4.
 Saint-Arnaud, 61. 26.
 Saint-Pierre, 72. 29.
 Sainte-Beuve, 40. 4; 164. 4.
 Sand, George, 64. 13.
saugrenu, 170. 24.
scoriae, 50. 12.
 Scribe, 127. 2.
 Segovia, 135. 2.
 Seneca, 233. 9.
 Shakespeare, his reading, 14. 2;
 quoted, 65. 21; 133. 6; 177. 2;
 216. 34.
 Sheba, 138. 1.
 Shelley, his incoherence, 13. 25;
 his reading, 13. 39; his sensitiveness, 69. 20.
 Simonides, 161. 37.
 Sinaitic Inscriptions, 49. 10.
 Somers, Lord, 26. 25.
 Sophocles, 13. 41; quoted, 162. 22.
 Sophron, 151. 14.
 Sotheby, Mr., 4. 9.

 Spurgeon, Mr., 143. 33.
 Stael, Madame de, 102. 28; 166. 31.
 Stanley, Dr., 28. 20.
 Stratford, Viscount, 61. 27.
 Strauss, 29. 22.
 Swedenborg, 183. 15.

 Tatham, Emma, 106. 18.
 Taylor, Jeremy, 50. 34.
 Thebes, 58. 4.
 Theocritus, 147. 15.
 Theresa, Saint, 96. 36; 102. 23.
 Thiers, 61. 10.
 Tiberius, 236. 16.
 Tieck, 117. 3.
 Titus Vespasianus, 137. 20.
 Trajan, 237. 27.
 transcendent, 6. 21.
 Trevelyan, Mr., 37. 9.
 Tübingen, 8. 6.

 urbanity, 49. 30.

 Van Vloten, 212. 22.
 Vauvenargues, 52. 35.
 Virgil, quotations from, 33. 20;
 241. 19.
 Voltaire, 15. 10; his disparagement of Spinoza, 192. 34.

 Wesley, 183. 15.
 White, Gilbert, 79. 40.
 Woolner, 59. 6.
 Wordsworth, his opinion of criticism, 10. 10; of Goethe, 13. 27;
 his Ecclesiastical Sonnets, 10. 38;
 quotations from his poems, 65.
 25; 82. 39; 153. 39; 182. 31.
 Wright, Mr., 3. 23.

PRINTED IN ENGLAND
 AT THE OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS