WORK IN PROGRESS

The Science of Character: Human Objecthood and the Ends of Victorian Realism

- Monograph examining the formal and philosophical innovations of turn-of-the-twentieth-century realist fiction
- Analyzes a series of little-studied, late-career novels and character sketches by George Eliot, Thomas Hardy, Olive Schreiner, and other New Woman novelists
- Develops a theory of late Victorian realism as a “science of character” that documents the material practices through which character forms

“Queer Rigidity: Necessities of Attraction and Desire,” article interrogating the emphasis on fluidity in queer studies through attention to the work of the nineteenth-century French philosopher and archaeologist, Félix Ravaisson.
